IN FOCUS THIS FORTNIGHT

Passage to the West

For the next 18 months, the US is going to receive India's answer to blue jeans and hamburgers, bubble gum and Coca-Cola. The Festival of India promises to electrify Americans into a radically changed awareness of the reality of India.

COVER STORY 90

Message to Moscow

The long-lasting love affair between the Soviets and the Nehru family continued during Rajiv's visit to Moscow last fortnight. But the visit also provided a rare opportunity to see how the new prime minister tackled his first foreign policy test.

SPECIAL REPORT 20

Feuding Factions

As the first anniversary of Operation Bluestar approaches, the Akali leadership is still locked in an internecine power struggle. While Longowal appealed for peace, there was concern over the communal colour of recent incidents of violence.

CURRENT EVENTS 26

Confessions of a Terrorist

One year after Operation Bluestar, doubts still persist on the modus operandi of terrorists based in the Golden Temple complex. Chilling details are now available from the confessions of Virsa Singh Valtoha, an AISSF activist now in custody.

CRIME 62

Sinister Designs

The US Federal Bureau of Investigation scored a telling blow for improved Indo-US ties by busting a US-based Sikh extremist assassination ring that had targeted Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi as well as other leading Indian politicians.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON 66

Meaning Business

Despite the overwhelming majority the ruling party enjoys, the mood in the just-adjourned Lok Sabha indicates that the positive and constructive atmosphere leaves the Opposition little room for complaint. And MP's are taking their jobs seriously.

Oberoi Hotels and Travel House present :

THE PALACE EXPERIENCE

4 days and 3 nights of luxury for only Rs. 1,234.*

Srinagar...truly a paradise on earth. And in this enchanted valley, nestling in the foothills of the Himalayas and overlooking the picturesque Dal Lake, the former royal palace of the Maharajas of Kashmir awaits your pleasure.

Today, the Oberoi Palace still retains the grandeur of another era, in its splendour and gracious living combined with modern luxuries and comforts. Spacious, elegant interiors, chandeliers, wood-panelling and magnificent carpets recreate a royal life-style.

Fountains play on the hotel's 20 acres of landscaped lawns and flowers bloom in colourful profusion in these terraced gardens that have a breathtaking view of the beautiful Dal Lake and the valley beyond. An idyllic retreat for holiday-makers and honeymooners alike, the Oberoi Palace offers you a royal experience like nowhere else in Kashmir.

Oberoi Palace

Srinagar, Kashmir

A PRINCELY PACKAGE*

Look at how much you get for only Rs. 1,234 per person sharing a double-room (or Rs 1,800 for single-occupancy) :

UNEXPLAINED MADNESS

Congratulations for your cover story 'Return of Terrorism' (May 31). You have taught millions of Indians how simple it is to be a terrorist. All we need do is follow B.K. Sharma's diagram of the anatomy of a bomb. No doubt more sophisticated technology can be obtained from any college or library. But it is still indiscreet for a magazine of your standing to publish it. I wish that in these times of crisis your editorial staff will exercise some discretion.

Secunderbad J. FRANKLIN

■ The cover story makes compelling reading. It is sad to know that a few individuals, divorced of reason, are perpetrating such heinous crimes in the name of religion. Sadder is the fact that the Sikh high priests, who did not take much time in declaring the President and Union Minister Buta Singh as "non-Sikhs" have not even condemned the terrorists.

The Sikh high priests should stop taking politically motivated steps. If they are really men of god, they should fearlessly condemn all acts of extremism and excommunicate such individuals from the panth. This step would go a long way to stem the rising tide of Sikh extremism and solve the Punjab problem. At the same time the Government should also take strong steps to safeguard the life and property of citizens.

Chandigarh GURPRATAP SINGH VIRK

■ Now we find a fresh change in the general Sikh outlook. Many Sikh intellectuals, leaders and others have clearly and unequivocally disassociated themselves from these terrorists and are even questioning their right to be called true Sikhs. Even Sikhs who till now covertly sided with terrorist activities have started to voice their concern, and non-Sikhs too do not any longer attribute the acts of a handful of terrorists to the entire community. This feeling, though belated, is a healthy sign and a good omen for solving the Punjab crisis.

Chandigarh RAVI KANT

■ The series of bomb explosions in north India is an obvious attempt by extremists to spread hatred among two communities. A small group of terrorists must not be allowed to spread a reign of terror and hold the entire country to ransom. The Government must not bow down to threats from hardliners who are dominating the affairs of the Akali Dal. The introduction of the Anti-Terrorist Bill is welcome and it is hoped that terrorists will now be dealt with more effectively.

Jaipur V. BALA KRISHNAN

EYE-OPENER

Your article "Trading in Blood" (May 31), will serve as an eye-opener for those who are not familiar with the avoidable hazards of blood transfusion. A stoppage to these malpractices is essential for restricting the diseased blood from going into the veins of sick people. One fails to understand why we are so indifferent in implementing the recommendations of the WHO and other international agencies.

Silchar, Assam DR SUNDAR LAL PATOA

RESERVATION DEBATE

I am shocked by the perverted logic of Gujarat Chief Minister Madhavsinh Solanki ('I'm confident I'll stay on', May 15) when he argues: "What about the non-reserved students who go off to Karnataka and get admissions in private colleges by paying huge capitation fees and then come back as doctors with very low marks? Is their merit ever doubted?"

There is no point in defending such students. Certainly they are doing wrong. Does Mr Solanki want to justify an evil by citing the example of another evil?

Ahmedabad RATILAL THAKKAR

The assumption that the agitation in Gujarat is totally pointless with regard to the amount of unfilled seats in the reserved quota in both engineering and medical colleges is totally illogical and profoundly astonishing. Perhaps your correspondent could explain how the Government could, in the first place, increase the quota of reservation without considering the basic law of supply and demand. When the Government does not have the vision to do so, how can we expect the agitators to look at the number

UNFAIR REPORT

Your report "Tarnished Image" (May 31) was an eye-opener and gave us a real insight into the Shah Government's corrupt practices. Every day we learn more of the growing discrimination and malpractices that this puppet government has resorted to. I am sorry to say that G.M. Shah has drawn a blank even in controlling the law and order situation, the springboard which catapulted him to the chief ministership last year. Clamping of curfew in Srinagar city is a normal occurrence and people have begun to live with the police harassment and baton charges.

It is time to think about whether the Shah Government has a moral right, let along a legal right, to run this sensitive state.

Srinagar SANDEEP CHOWDHRY

GUNS AND GOONS

The law and order situation in Bombay may be depressing (Crackdown in Bombay, May 15) but thank God that for every Varadarajan Mudaliar, Yusuf Patel, Vasantrao Patil and Haji Mastan on that side, the Bombayite has a Julio Ribeiro, Yadunath Pawar, G.R. Khairnar and Arun Bhatia on this side.

Bombay JAYESH B. MEHTA

BOOMING BANKS

Apropos of your report ('Banking on a Boom', May 15) the complacency of the Government as well as the RBI is beyond comprehension. The only remedy is to amend the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, in a suitable manner so as to prevent vested interests from taking advantage of semantic quibbles.

Bassein, Maharashtra PRABHAKARAN N.

CHAOTIC SYSTEM

Your Comment (Misusing the Army, May 15) is well made. I do not see the problem as a failure of the police to cope with the situation, but as the failure of the governments to keep the police force in a good mood. Policemen are ill-paid, made to work in a hostile atmosphere, and exposed to excessive political interference. Until policemen are freed from these shackles, they will be no better than ordinary people.

In an atmosphere of escalating violence all over the country, we need a police force that can withstand the pressures from both the rulers and the people. We have a tendency to make them the scapegoats for all failures. Unless we treat them as human beings, as part of society and give them their due share by way of better working conditions and pay, they will continue to fail to meet crises. And that will see to it that the army will have to be called in every time.

Belgaum GANAPAYYA B.

DISPUTED DEED

This is with reference to your report on Shaw Wallace ('The Acquisition Enigma', May 15). It has been suggested that I elicited the aid of a south Indian businessman, G. Venkateswaran and his investment companies and also that when the Income Tax Department seized the transfer documents lodged by these investment companies, it put the Shaw Wallace management in a bit of a spot.

Mr Venkateswaran is totally unknown to the undersigned or to Shaw Wallace & Co Ltd, who brought to the notice of the Government of India the facts of these purchases and the subsequent action of the Income Tax Department in Madras. Your correspondent states that the nominees of the financial institutions were present at an "unofficial board meeting in New Delhi". No nominee of any financial institution has been present at any discussion amongst any of the directors.

New Delhi S.P. ACHARYA
(chairman,) Shaw Wallace & Co Ltd

Mr Acharya refused to meet our correspondent despite repeated efforts.

MOVING HOUSE

There has been a lot of discussion with regard to the permanent residence of the prime minister. From all considerations of security, the best bet would be Teen Murti House. It is even more sheltered than Rashtrapati Bhavan, and should be made the permanent residence of the Indian prime minister for all time. After all, we cannot go on converting various residences into monuments in memory of all the leaders we love.

New Delhi B.P. NIGAM

CHEAPER SOLUTION

Your story ('Crippling Scourge', May 15) brings to the notice of the common man in Rajasthan the problem of fluorosis. However, several agencies in the state have already been working for over a decade in the field and have achieved considerable success.

While the Defence Laboratory Institute, (DLI) Jodhpur, boasts of its deflouridation technique costing Rs 100 for every six litres of water, the NEERI, (a subsidiary of the CSIR) has developed the same (Nalgonda technique) at the cost of just a few rupees a bucketful. The public health engineering department of Rajasthan has changed the water supply system and installed it afresh in several villages due to this very problem. Community defluoridation experiments were also undertaken in villages like Shivadaspur of Chaksu tehsil and Lacchipura of Nagore, but they could not achieve their goals due to the non-cooperation of villagers arising from their illiteracy.

Ajmer DR SHIV CHANDRA

■ The report on fluorosis makes pathetic reading especially when the proven technology of Reverse Osmosis (RO) is available locally.

The Gujarat Water Supply and Sewerage Board (GWSSB) has already embarked on a scheme to provide potable water to the rural population with the help of RO plants at a cost of about Rs 5 per 1,000 litres compared to the Rs 100 per six litres for the DLI kit. The Rajasthan Government should investigate the GWSSB's scheme.

Bombay R.P. DESAI

FADING STAR

It is not a simple task to fully assess the genius of Kishore Kumar ('The Last Encore', May 15). And it is certainly not health reasons or income tax raids that have forced the singer to announce his retirement.

A genius loves healthy competition. Kishore's competition ended when Mohammad Rafi died in 1980. Besides, with composers producing such trite stuff, most of the songs Kishore has been getting are less than mediocre. Indian film music has been decaying since the mid-'70s. In this period, the more melodious songs went to Rafi because Kishore has the rare ability to raise the trashiest of tunes to a level acceptable to the masses. That was enough for the producers and composers—but not for Kishore. Not any more. And he has taken the right decision by announcing his retirement for he has etched a permanent place in the hearts of music lovers.

Tomorrow begins here

Computers from BPL. For better information processing.

They are being used increasingly, even for unconventional applications...

In the engineering entrance exams for instance. Where the computer evaluates answer papers, prints out results and maintains academic records.

Like the Computer, BPL's other Office Automation Products also go a long way in increasing efficiency and productivity: Small Business Systems, Word Processors, Automatic Plain Paper Copiers, Electronic Scanners and Private Automatic Exchanges.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Computers, Communications, Components, Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement) and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Texmate, USA; Sanyo, Japan and IMS, USA. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL: Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

Embittered Minds

VIOLENCE brutalises both its victims and its perpetrators, as recent events have shown. And a society which doesn't confront this fact will sooner or later lose touch with the norms of acceptable, civilised behaviour.

The men responsible for the bomb blasts and killings that rocked Delhi and other northern cities last month deserve the most rigorous punishment that can be dealt to them---but in accordance with the law. There can be no justification for the death in custody of Mohinder Singh Khalsa. No matter what the police say, it is plain that the man was tortured to death, an example not only of the unnecessary crudity of the police's interrogation methods but also of its ineptness in protecting a potential source of information. The remarkable thing is not that it happened. Police brutality and torture in custody are, sadly enough, not uncommon in this country. What was perhaps without precedence was the lack of a public outcry. When the Bihar police blinded its captives in Bhagalpur five years ago, there was angry protest even though the victims were criminals, some of them notorious for the viciousness of their crimes. Death by police encounter usually elicits protest from the media and civil liberties groups and, indeed, it is such exposures which ultimately put an end to staged encounters in Uttar Pradesh three years ago.

This time round, there has been less than a whimper of protest. This shows up many things. The public, appalled at the devastation caused by Sikh terrorists, isn't any longer willing to give them any quarter. The popular perception is simply that the man deserved what he got. This is understandable but unacceptable. It indicates a dangerous slide away from civilised behaviour which lays down the inviolable principle that however heinous a crime, the criminal has to be dealt with according to the law.

Today it is a despised maker of bombs that kill innocent people. But tomorrow it could be a political opponent, an inconvenient activist, an unrelenting critic of authority, anybody whose continued existence is perceived as a threat to the powers that be. If this sounds far-fetched, it is worth remembering the enormous powers that have been given to the authorities in the new anti-terrorist legislation. It cannot be overstated that the authorities need all the help, encouragement and muscle they need in combating this menace. Equally, it cannot be over-emphasised that with such power goes a concomitant responsibility to not misuse that power. Killing Mohinder in custody is ultimately counter-productive and makes the task of keeping society civilised that much more difficult.

If it were merely a matter of the Government simply ordering the police to stop torturing its captives to death, that would be the end of it. Unfortunately, such deeds merely reflect the decay of social values that has been accelerated in the climate of violence generated by the Punjab problem. The lionising of the relatives of two men charged with the assassination of a prime minister by some Sikhs is an equally despicable act. It is not a question of approving or disapproving of Mrs Gandhi's handling of the Punjab crisis and her government's decision to send the army into the Golden Temple. No civilised society, no religion, sanctions assassination and anyone who believes that Bhindranwale and his cohorts were not terrorists and whose death had to be avenged by the murder of Indira Gandhi is at best guilty of self-delusion.

Unfortunately, the rot is so deep that rational argument makes no impact. This explains why the country is being treated to the sorry spectacle of Bhindranwale's father setting up a so-called Akali committee comprising men charged with serious crimes who are either locked up in jail or on the run from the police. And like the lack of a public outcry against Mohinder's death in custody, the evidently widespread acceptance of such a committee and the attempt to make martyrs of two assassins indicates how far gone is the decay of civilised behaviour.

It is time to stop and think. If peace is to return, if the headlong rush towards confrontation is to be stopped then people on both sides of the Hindu-Sikh divide must face up to these realities. There's no time to lose because the first anniversary of Operation Bluestar in early June could easily be marked by a fresh round of violence. There is no dearth of hotheads on either side who believe either that their honour lies in vengeance or that the violence of the terrorist calls for a fitting reply in kind.

Having publicly called for a 'genocide week', the Akali leaders are obviously in no position to call it off. But they can at least contain the extent of the folly by making sure that it is restrained in its observance. On its part, the Government must not only keep the peace, it should seriously consider such radical steps as the cancellation of all private arms licences to flush out weapons and a crackdown on the cottage arms industry that flourishes in Punjab, Uttar Pradesh and elsewherein the country. Ultimately, however, the onus lies wholly on the people at large to refuse to be drawn into a communal cauldron, to resist provocation from wherever it comes, and to stop the rot that removes sanity from their minds and makes animals out of men.

A modular home. What it is. What makes it so different. And why it's been such a runaway success.

Until now & right through the ages investing in real estate meant you either bought a plot, or a fully-constructed house. If you bought a plot, you also ended up buying the onerous hassles of construction, besides penalties for non-construction and the chances of encroachment on your property. And if you bought a house, you'd probably have had to settle for a match box that you really didn't want anyway. All because you couldn't put together the money that a nice spacious home costs.

Enter the Modular Home.

DLF's new modular home concept now gives you exactly what you've always wanted – a plot, with a home that you can build in stages. As and when you can afford to. Each stage is a module and each module is complete in itself. You can choose the module that you want. And then construct the next module when you can afford to or have the time to.

The first module — what it costs.

In the first module, you get a large drawing-dining, a kitchen and a bathroom. With large lawns at the rear and in the front. With the facia completely finished. All this for almost half the amount you'd pay for a full house. And even this is payable over several years.

What else do you get? — a weekend home.

Your modular home is your ideal weekend retreat. The wide open spaces, fresh air, sprawling lawns and preferential club membership make it a dream getaway from the hustle & bustle of city life. Construction of the club has already commenced. So instead of packing your bags & going to the hills to get away from it all, all you have to do is drive to your own weekend home with swimming, tennis & a drink thrown in. Besides, the large lawns that your children can sport in. In other words, even though you might ultimately shift to DLF Qutab Enclave much later, your modular home is usable much earlier.

An easy payment plan. With institutional finance also available. Just Rs. 10,000/- to register.

All you need is just Rs. 10,000/- to book your modular home. The balance is payable in easy instalments over several years. And what's best of all, is that unlike a plot, you can finance your modular home with help from various financial institutions.

The homes are going fast. So book today.

DLF is offering only a limited number of modular homes at present on 200,215,251 &400 sq.yd. plots. So book your modular home today. Remember, all you need is just Rs. 10,000/-

SOAP OPERA

■ Chivalry was the code of the Middle Ages: knights and lords would do anything for the lady of their heart for a look or something more. Can such devotion be alive in the material-obsessed world of today? Yes, as a lady in the Bombay Municipal Corporation will testify.

After having lunch, she got to talking with her colleagues and by and by the conversation became a little like modern theatre: all gesture. One particularly wide sweep of her hand pushed the tiffin box out of the window onto a corrugated roof 10 ft below. Upon which the lady called helplessly for help.

It was not long in coming, in the shape of a lean and eager man. He got onto the window sill, pushed away a dozen or so people who tried to get him to use a ladder, and leapt. He leapt well but not wisely for he hit the roof, broke through it, and landed with an agonising thud. But chivalry triumphed: as he was being carried away to the hospital with a broken ankle, he handed over the tiffin box to the grateful lady.

COSTLY CAPER

■ The pot of gold is as elusive as ever for most of us toilers, but sometimes it comes to the doorstep of a favoured few and one of the favoured few happens to live in Pune, Maharashtra.

He had spare money on his hands and thought he would buy a video recorder. Being a prudent man, he purchased a unit from a shop where they sell customs-confiscated goods. Taking it home, he discovered it did not work and on opening the back-plate found, besides the gadgetry, three cakes of soap, neatly and attractively wrapped. It was an extremely angry young man who took the VCR back to the shop and an even angrier one who returned with the salesman's suave "Sorry, goods once sold cannot be taken back" ringing loudly in his ears.

Being a thrifty person, his wife advised her fuming husband to take the thing to a repairman first thing in the morning. Meanwhile, they might as well use the soap. She unwrapped one, stared for a second, then dropped to the floor in a dead faint. The young man rushed to her, then forgot all about her as he tore away the other two wrappers and started prancing around the room with three gold biscuits in his trembling hands.

TEST CASE

■ Examinations in India are exciting things: invigilators get knifed, students turn up with the story of Aurangzeb tattooed in strategically located spots, papers get mixed up and so on. A student of the Mohanlal Sukhadia University in Jaipur has just added a pioneering exploit to that lore.

He was sitting for his M. Com. examination and had prepared thoroughly for it: not in the orthodox sense, but in quite another way. Strapped to his leg was a microcassette recorder and just inside the cuff of his shirt was taped the earphone. A supply of pre-recorded micro-cassettes was in the custody of a friend outside. While he wrote his paper, he put his head on his arm in the classic Renoir pose of the student, listened and started copying. Every once in a while, he would go out of the examination hall on some pretext insert a fresh cassette and return with renewed confidence.

The invigilator could not understand how anybody could write for so long in that "relaxed" pose. He went closer, suspecting the worst, frisked the student and his eyes popped open when he saw the intricate machinery in position. Thus did the age of electronic copying furnish its first martyr.

HOLY WEDLOCK

■ Marriages are made in heaven. That's what everybody believes but in fact they are made on earth after a lot of sweat and bother over who should marry whom, when, how and how much. But even after nothing has been left to chance a small grain of sand can gum up the works.

A dhoti-clad bridegroom was centre-piece of a baraat in a village in Uttar Pradesh.

Consternation! The girl, it appeared, was refusing to marry and her relatives were supporting her: the reason was that they didn't want a dhoti-clad son-in-law but preferred a 'mod' someone who wore trousers. On that small point, incredible as it may sound the wedding was halted, the bride retired to brood inside and the groom got ready to go home and mope about his curious fate.

But stories should have a happy ending. On the way back the erstwhile groom's party met another party which, as fate would have had it, included a comely girl who, when she heard of the poor man's experience said she had nothing against dhotis and promised to marry him. Amid much rejoicing the marriage was solemnised as soon as it was decently possible. Perhaps marriages are made in heaven.

And do you know why?

Gopi offers me the latest technology and three jars with the basic machine — not just one. All at no extra cost.

So only Gopi lets me switch from blending... to dry grinding... to wet grinding to whatever... in seconds. With no hassles, such as fiddling with sharp blades.

Gopi also gives me the widest choice of optional attachments for special jobs. Each self-enclosed.

Come to think of it, Gopi does the work of a food processor, blender, juicer and grinder. Imagine the money I save by not having to buy them individually!

What's more, Gopi's heavy duty motor makes it the best machine for Indian conditions. In fact, I run it as long as I want. And the operating instructions are so easy to follow.

The Gopi machine is so good, you get a 5 year guarantee (including the motor) and lifetime free service.

What more could any woman want?

RAJIV GANDHI

The Message to Moscow

RAJIV GANDHI set some kind of a record on last fortnight's visit to the Soviet Union. At every city on his schedule, he deplaned in unseasonal rain. When he left, it was in brilliant sunshine. But there was a symbolism in the meteorological phenomena. On his first official visit since becoming prime minister, Rajiv managed to firmly consolidate the durable love affair between the Soviet Union and the Nehru family. But though the visit was a clear indication of the future direction of Indian foreign policy, it also offered a rare and intimate glimpse of the prime minister's operating style, his interaction with his close aides and advisers and their place in the current Indian power structure. Associate Editor DILIP BOBB was on board the Boeing that carried Rajiv and his entourage to Moscow and back. His report:

Photographs by TASS

FOR VISITORS to the Soviet Union, the most-sought-after souvenir after Stolichnaya vodka is a stout wooden doll that opens in the middle to reveal another and yet another till the last one, tinier than a thumbnail. In many ways, the multiple doll symbolises more than anything else, the problems of probing the collective mind of the Soviet leadership in bilateral exchanges: strip one layer, and another appears in its place. In that context, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi didn't quite get down to uncovering the last miniscule doll during last fortnight's whirlwind visit to the Soviet Union, but he came as close to it as was politically and humanly possible.

That, in itself, was the single most creditable achievement of his high-profile five-day tour that succeeded in elevating Indo-Soviet relations to a new and more mutually beneficial plateau after a period of relative uncertainty and edginess on both sides. In fact, when Air-India's Boeing 707, Annapurna, carrying the prime minister and his 31-member official entourage touched down at Moscow's Sheremetiavo-1 Airport in driving rain and a bone-chilling wind, senior aides on board were still unclear as to whether or not the reception would match the weather. "We really had no indication of how they were going to treat the visit. We had been preparing for it for weeks but in all our discussions they gave us absolutely no clue as to what their thinking was," said a top official.

In the end, the worries and uncertainty cleared as abruptly as the drizzle and the long-lasting love affair between the Soviets and the Nehru family passed on to the newest member of the clan. Despite his relative inexperience and lack of exposure, Rajiv's boyish good looks, his natural charm and seeming sincerity exerts a powerful pull. The day before his arrival, a young Russian woman interviewed on Soviet television was asked why she sounded so enthusiastic about seeing Rajiv. Her answer: "Because he is the most handsome leader in the world." Though superficial and trite, it was nonetheless a response that manifested itself in remarkable ways and over the widest possible spectrum of straight-laced Soviet society.

In an interview shortly before the visit, the new Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachov, had remarked that "Indian leaders are received with a special feeling here" and it was clearly no hollow platitude. All along the broad and lengthy expanse of Gorky Street, Moscow's main boulevard, hundreds of people of all ages and both sexes braved the daunting weather to grab a glimpse of the young Indian leader and greet him with shouts of 'Miree, Druzbah' (peace, friendship) as he flashed past in his bullet-proof Zil limousine flanked by an impressive wedge of motorcycle outriders.

For the next two days, as Rajiv and his close aides closetted themselves in the historic and stunningly beautiful innards of the Kremlin with Soviet leaders, Miree, Druzbah continued to remain the dominant theme. Outside, the winter thaw had given way to the first flush of a Moscow spring when the apple blossoms, lilacs and tulips that offer welcome and colourful contrast to the drab and depressing architecture of the buildings and condominiums, are in full and glorious bloom. Inside, the first flush of the Indo-Soviet spring was experiencing an equally luxuriant flowering. Not since the intimate affinity between Jawaharlal Nehru and Nikita Khruschev have leaders of the two countries forged such an instant and visible rapport as did Rajiv Gandhi and Mikhail Gorbachov, a rapport that was already tentatively established during their first meeting at the funeral of Gorbachov's predecessor, Konstantin Ustinovich Chernenko, earlier this year.

Gorbachov presenting Rajiv a lilac blossom on their Kremlin stroll

The official schedule, in fact, was a mere formality. Details of the two economic agreements signed in Moscow under the glittering chandeliers of the Kremlin's historic Vladimir Hall had already been worked out between the two sides well in advance of the visit. One gives India, Soviet credit to the tune of one billion roubles (Rs 1,400 crore) to finance a wide range of projects, mainly in power, coal, oil, machine-building and ferrous technology with the low interest credit to be used for Soviet purchase of Indian goods. The other, more wide-ranging agreement, is set in a longer-term perspective and chalks out the directions of economic, scientific and technical cooperation till the year 2000. But eventually, it was the shadows rather than the substance that proved to be of infinitely more import and significance.

Kremlin-watchers were quick to note the many ways in which Gorbachov deliberately broke protocol, much to the annoyance of his stolid and straight-jacketed security guards, during the two days that he and Rajiv were together. On the morning that the private talks between the two leaders were to start, Gorbachov arrived unannounced and certainly unscheduled at the Kremlin apartment where Rajiv and his family were staying ten minutes before they were officially supposed to meet. In what Soviet officials admit is a rare and unusual gesture, Gorbachov informed his bemused Indian counterpart that it was too beautiful a day to waste and rather than drive to the block where the talks were scheduled in curtained limousines, they would do better to walk. While security procedures were thrown out of synch, Gorbachov, stout and muscular with a livid scar across his broad forehead and Rajiv, slim and elegant in his Nehru jacket and tasselled Gucci shoes, linked arms and strolled through the Kremlin gardens. At one point, during the walk Gorbachov stopped, broke off a branch of lilac and presented it to Rajiv with an impish flourish.

Later, the two leaders kept the entire Politburo waiting half an hour for the official signing of the agreements because, as Gorbachov later said with a laugh, "we forgot to look at our watches". Clearly, the talks between the two leaders were emboldened by the rapport that they had already struck. In retrospect, it was, in a way, inevitable. Gorbachov and Rajiv have much that is in common. Both are young—at 55 Gorbachov is the youngest leader the Soviets have had and certainly the most unconventional. Both have embarked on a massive reorientation programme in their respective countries, a programme that has its base in a new approach to issues, the workings of the Government and the induction of new technology from the West. More important, in conversations with Soviets, it is apparent that Gorbachov like Rajiv in India, symbolises a new hope and optimism for his people and their future.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

But despite the genuine warmth and affinity displayed by both leaders, there were shortfalls in expectations. The Soviets have been making a concerted effort to get a commitment from India on an extension of the 20-year Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation signed in 1971 between Mrs Gandhi and Leonid Brezhnev which expires in 1991. The Indian side has so far been hedging and stalling and the Soviets were clearly expecting a firm commitment during the visit. The fact that it was not forthcoming indicates that the Indian Government is not interested in renewing the treaty. Similarly, the Soviets were overly keen to get a definite yes from India on the purchase of the MiG-29 which they have been plugging as a counter to Pakistan's F-16s. Instead, they got a nyet, or rather, a not yet.

But clearly the disappointments were more than offset by the gains. Soviet worries that Rajiv's pro-western image and outlook would take India even further on the divergent path that started with the country's arms diversification programme in the late '70s were soon dispelled by Rajiv's strident and in fact, excessive criticism of the US during his visit. In diplomatic terms, it seemed an imprudent and negative approach considering the recent upturn in Indo-US relations, his programme to induct state-of-the-art technology available only in the US and its ally, Japan, and the fact that he is scheduled to visit that country next month. His statements are certain to upset the occupants of the White House and Capitol Hill.

Yet, the fact that he deliberately embarked on such a course is clear indication that the edifice of India's future foreign policy will rest heavily on the firm foundations of India's relationship with the Soviet Union. At his crowded press conference in Moscow, Rajiv, when asked why he had chosen Moscow for his first official tour as prime minister, jokingly replied that "I had to start somewhere and it so happens that the Soviets asked me first". But senior foreign office officials accompanying the prime minister confirmed that whatever wooing was done as far as the West was concerned, the two top priorities in India's foreign policy will be the Soviet Union and India's neighbours. In fact, while in the middle of his talks in Moscow, Rajiv summoned Foreign Secretary Romesh Bhandari and instructed him to take off for Sri Lanka on their return to ensure that Sri Lankan President J.R. Jayewardene makes a visit to New Delhi before the first week of June.

In Moscow, there were other indications of India's policy to maintain close links with the Soviets. The joint communique issued at the end of the visit was only remarkable for the issues that were left unsaid, namely Afghanistan and Kampuchea, two areas where India has been consistently criticised for its rather lonely pro-Soviet stand, specially since it is the Soviet presence in Afghanistan that offers the US a tailor-made excuse to pour arms into Pakistan. But obviously the success of Rajiv's visit depended on bending with the breeze without actually breaking. "The Soviets know full well that we disapprove of their presence, a fact we have impressed upon them in private before. But we also appreciate that they will not leave till they are absolutely sure of leaving behind a pro-Soviet regime that faces no threat from the Mujahedeen. The solution is a political one and not a military one," said a senior member of the Indian delegation in Moscow.

BUT whatever the perceptions, Rajiv's visit was not an absolutely unqualified success from the Indian point of view and that seemed more a matter of bad planning than any diplomatic gaffes on his part. For one, it was clearly clumsy policy to arrange his visits to the Soviet Union and the US so close together, knowing that in Moscow he would be compelled to adopt an anti-US stand which would hamstring his subsequent dealings with the US Government during his visit to the United States.

Secondly, it seemed surprising that he should have spent three days out of five visiting monuments in Minsk or watching a slushy equestrian display in Issyk-kul in Khirgizia on the Chinese border when he would have been better served getting acquainted with the Soviet leadership in Moscow, specially if the Soviet Union is to play a pivotal role in Indian foreign policy. Informal chats with Soviet leaders like the wily and experienced Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko would have been far more constructive than exchanging pleasantries with the first secretary of the communist party of Khirgizia in faraway Frunze.

The cooing and billing apart, Rajiv's Russian rendezvous contained a significance that extended well beyond the confines of Indo-Soviet ties. As his first official visit since becoming prime minister, it offered, for one, a rare opportunity to observe at close and intimate quarters how Rajiv tackled his first foreign policy test, his relationship with his close aides and advisers and where they stood in the new hierarchy, and his operating style. It proved a revealing exercise.

Despite his deceptively youthful demeanour—at times it is difficult to accept the fact that he is prime minister of the world's largest democracy—Rajiv radiates a subtle charisma. In Moscow, on his first couple of engagements, he appeared a bit nervous and unsure of himself. But as the visit progressed, his confidence grew visibly and by the end he was performing like he had been doing it all his life. He displayed a casual and relaxed style that was strangely appealing, specially in the stifingly bureaucratic atmosphere of Moscow. Despite the efforts of Soviet security personnel to hustle him along whenever there were crowds present, Rajiv made a point to exchange words with bystanders or wave and smile in appreciation of the fact that they had come out in inclement weather to see him, even on the most solemn of occasions.

Gorbachov and Rajiv signing the economic agreement in the Kremlin with key Indian officials and Politburo members ranged behind powerful man on earth and also a man who worships a different ideological deity. At no time, even ranged alongside the stern and aged members of the Soviet Politburo, did he look uncomfortable and out of place. The job is obviously growing on him and vice versa.

Alongside his attractive wife Sonia, they project the same romantic appeal that has endeared Britain's Prince Charles and Lady Diana to millions. Sonia, however, has a lot to learn from her husband. A person who has long shunned the limelight and is obviously uncomfortable in it, she seemed unable to overcome her diffidence throughout the trip. It clearly had little to do with security. In no other country could India's First Family have been safer. Yet on more than one occasion on her separate schedule, she brushed past onlookers who had waited for hours to see her, and at one point an accompanying journalist gently suggested that a wave or namaste would do her image no harm.

But the situation was saved by the most unlikeliest of ambassadors—her two children Rahul and Priyanka. Unspoilt and attractive, they have a vulnerability that is intensely appealing. Their casual attire and their friendly nature only adds to the appeal. On the special flight to Moscow, restive in the confines of the plush cabin up front reserved for the prime minister's family, they wandered around the plane joking with their security personnel or in polite conversation with their father's aides. The Soviets have a great fondness for children, as is apparent from the many advantages and privileges for the young, and Rahul and Priyanka, despite the presence of more seasoned performers, went a long way in winning friends and influencing the Soviet people.

The curious composition of the delegation was, in fact, even more of a revelation. Whether by deliberate design or by accident, the prime minister's party was made up of the current movers and shakers, the men, or most of the men, who now hold India's destiny in their untried hands. The laid back informality between most members of the party—a strikingly new element in Indian bureaucracy—was of the kind that exists only in people who wear power well and without fear or favour. That, more than anything else, is a reflection on Rajiv's style more than theirs for they represent the people he trusts more than anybody else and are those who he can relate to.

TASS

THOUGH number five in terms of protocol, the top dog is obviously Rajiv's close friend and Parliamentary Secretary Arun Singh. Despite the presence of more senior officials like Finance Minister V.P. Singh, G. Parthasarathi, chairman of the policy planning committee, and Foreign Secretary Romesh Bhandari, Arun Singh is obviously The Man when it comes to taking decisions, and he takes them instantly, secure in the knowledge that he is doing just what Rajiv would want him to do. His authority, despite his inexperience, is unquestioned. Unlike the abrasive Arun Nehru who likes hogging the limelight, Arun Singh prefers to stay in the background, hands in his pockets, quietly observing the scene and issuing rapid-fire instructions when required, especially on matters concerning the security of the First Family. And, for a man in his position and influence, he is surprisingly accessible and open, with none of the arrogant imperiousness of people who have their first taste of power.

Another man who maintains a low profile and yet has Rajiv's ear and trust is Finance Minister V.P. Singh. His conversations with Rajiv seem more those of a friend and valued adviser than a politician who holds a crucial portfolio. The fact that he has a clean image is what perhaps endears him to Rajiv and lends an easy familiarity to their relationship. As finance minister, his was a crucial role in Moscow considering that the agreements signed were mainly economic but not for one moment did he behave like he had more right to be there than any of the others, a trait that seems to be in short supply among the rest of his more stodgy ministerial colleagues.

Rajiv also seems to have a good equation with Romesh Bhandari, perhaps because of the very characteristics that some of Bhandari's colleagues in the Indian Foreign Service are highly critical of—his casual and informal approach and his dovish, make-love-not-war image. But Bhandari's relaxed and informal style is certainly a welcome change from the rigid and overly conservative attitude of some of his more illustrious predecessors. Certainly, none of them would have replied the way he did to the question of what it was like working for Rajiv. "I'll give you the answer in one word," he said, "exhilarating."

Of Rajiv's other aides, Oscar Fernandes clearly has the edge over the others present in Moscow like Gopi Arora and C.R. Gharekhan, in terms of access to the prime minister and delegation of authority. At the official banquets and get-togethers with their Soviet counterparts, old-timers like G. Parthasarathi seemed to be anachronisms, there for protocol reasons rather than their place in the new scheme of things. What was in evidence was a tightly-knit team, inexperienced and perhaps unacquainted with the devious ways of the world they now inhabit, but still a team.

In that sense, Rajiv's visit to the Soviet Union was more indicative of the new Indian powerhouse than the one that sits in the gilded halls of the Kremlin. The Soviets have traditionally had a soft corner for the Indian people and the Indian leadership, one of whom actually breathed his last in one of their cities. Three days after Rajiv left Moscow with his entourage, his official business well behind him, the Soviet press and television channels were still giving him top billing and the crowds at his non-official stops, even more enthusiastic. How long the affair lasts will depend on events beyond his control. But whether it was the overpowering atmosphere of Moscow, the genteel elegance of Minsk or the coarseness of Khirgizia, he left behind a lasting impression of warmth and sincerity and above all, a dedication to ideals that, strangely enough, suddenly seemed much more attainable.

USSR

A Separate Reality

LIFE behind the Iron Curtain is a far cry from the apocryphal image that is painted so vigorously in the west, as Associate Editor DILIP BOBB discovered on his recent visit to that country, during which he met a wide cross section of Soviet society. His report:

A JEANS-CLAD couple is locked in amorous embrace in a park framed by the russet splendour of a late setting sun. A few hundred yards away, more elegantly dressed couples gyrate to the husky, breathless voice of Tina Turner in a strobe-patterned basement discotheque. Higher up, on the slopes of the city, a young man glides along on a skateboard, oblivious to the track-suited joggers around him Paris? London? Washington? The answer, surprising as it may seem to some, is Moscow.

Thanks to the hyperactive imagination of spy fiction writers and the lack of objectivity in much of the western media, the popular image of the Soviet Union is of a dark and depressing dungeon peopled by Homburg-hatted apparatchiks and grimy, ill-clad workers bowed down with the weight of an overbearing and stifling system. The truth, apparent even on the briefest of visits to that country, is somewhat different. The Soviet Union may not be the workers' paradise that party propagandists extol so tortuously, but it is still a distant whimper from the dank and gloomy portrait that is so often painted.

The only visibly depressing feature is the heavy, Gothic facade of the older buildings. But the less populated parts of Moscow, like the Lenin Hills, with its orderly rows of apple blossom trees and well-manicured lawns, is as beautiful and inspiring as any comparable feature in the west. The people, especially the young, are gaily and fashionably dressed, though jeans predominate and are still very much a status symbol.

The GUM (pronounced Ghoom) and other department stores are laid out like their western counterparts with escalators leading to different departments and are well stocked with East European products which, though not as varied and imaginatively packed and displayed as their western equivalents, are adequate for a society unbombarded with television advertising and unworshipful of conspicuous consumption.

But even for those who are and can afford the premium prices, there are the so-called "dollar shops" which sell Japanese electronic goods, French perfume, German television sets and Italian footwear. Though officially meant for tourists, the fact that the dollar on the flourishing black market fetches around four roubles as against the official price of virtual parity (one rouble = Rs 14) is enough indication that, even in the Soviet Union, where there is a will, there will be a way.

Contrary to popular myth, Soviet citizens can—and do—own their own apartments through a cooperative housing system, though all land is state-owned. For the last few years, housing and city planning has been given top priority and the massive condominiums that dominate the skylines of most Soviet cities are the most enduring image of the country. To ensure that population does not outpace availability, there are laws that prevent citizens of one city from migrating to another though there are no restrictions on them visiting other cities. Rents are controlled and cheap. A three-room apartment in Moscow with a kitchen, bathroom, central heating, gas and other basic amenities costs around 20 roubles a month while a two-room apartment goes for around nine roubles. The average wage for a skilled worker is well over 200 roubles a month. Incentives and bonuses are additional. The only tax Soviets pay is a direct income tax which is 8 per cent for those earning 150 roubles and less and 13 per cent for those earning more than that amount.

The Soviet Union may not be the workers' paradise that party propagandists extol, but it is still a distant cry from the dank and gloomy portrait that is so often painted.

The Soviet system is based on social pricing which ensures that the costs of necessities like bread and foodstuffs are kept to a minimum and have been for the last decade. Beef, the most popular dish in a Soviet house—the Soviet appetite and capacity for meat is as prodigious as their consumption of vodka—costs just over two roubles a kilo while chicken and mutton cost slightly more. There are, again contrary to popular myth, no serpentine queues in front of food stores and only a very few items are in seasonal short supply. The Soviets produce champagne and cognac that is as good as anything produced in the French regions they are named after and their ice cream and confectionery, especially cakes and chocolates, are comparable to the best.

Travel by public transport must be the cheapest in the world and the streets are well-maintained and clean. On the famed and awe-inspiring Moscow Metro stations which are more like museums with chandeliers and ancient statues and frescoes, an all-day ticket is 50 kopeks (half a rouble) and has been for the last three decades. The ticket also entitles the holder to travel on any other form of public transport like buses, trams or electric trolley cars, all very efficiently run. The Moscow Metro celebrated its 50th anniversary last fortnight and it is a tribute to its engineering that the only accident on the system in all that time was when a newly-installed escalator collapsed. The state airline, Aeroflot, must be constantly in the red considering the ridiculously low air fares. A ticket from Moscow to Tashkent, a distance of almost 3,500 kilometres, is around 60 roubles. Airports around the country are, not surprisingly, fairly crowded with travellers. An additional incentive is the fact that hotel accommodation, for locals, is dirt cheap. A hotel room that would set a foreign tourist back by 40 roubles a night costs a Soviet citizen a mere four or five roubles.

Few Soviet citizens feel the need for their own transport though there are an increasing number of private cars on city streets. The choice, however, is limited and relatively expensive. The cheapest car, a Fiat built in collaboration with the Italians costs 9,000 roubles while the only other car available on the open market is the sturdy Volga which carries a price tag of 14,000 roubles. The other two cars produced in the country, the Zil and the Chaika, the former made in a tank factory from bullet-proof material are only available to top officials. The cost of petrol has only recently been raised to around 40 kopeks a litre from its original rate of a mere 25 kopeks.

Every Soviet citizen, from the head of state down to the lowest worker, is decreed by law to take a month's vacation after every 11 months of work. The country is dotted with holiday camps and sanatoriums which cost virtually nothing and are free for children. All education and medical treatment is free for everybody, with the result that most Soviet salaries are spent in buying food or clothes and the rate of savings is one of the highest in the world.

The new Soviet leadership under Gorbachov is obviously bent on relaxing the stranglehold of the state over the citizenry. All over the country, churches and cathedrals are being lovingly restored, an indication that religion is no longer the cardinal crime it was earlier. Even the newer buildings and apartment houses are of a different architecture with more emphasis on colour and design.

The Soviet system is based on social pricing which ensures costs of all basic necessities like bread and foodstuffs are kept to a minimum and have been for the last decade

But there is bad news around the corner, esspecially for Soviet males. Gorbachov has embarked on a serious crackdown on drinking and the anti-alcohol campaign was to start officially from June 1. But its effects are already being felt. For the first time in the history of the Kremlin, no vodka was served at the official banquet given for Rajiv Gandhi and his delegation and the low spirits of Soviet officials indicates that the crackdown has already begun as far as official receptions are concerned.

Gorbachov, however, is obviously justified in his campaign. Though Soviet statistics are unavailable or deceptive, alcoholism is undoubtedly a major problem—the country's per capita consumption of spirits is one of the highest in the world. It has led to a serious drop in industrial productivity and is the single biggest cause of divorce and traffic accidents. The new alcohol-related laws introduce stiffer penalties for drink-related accidents or criminal activities.

The Soviets also have a curious fascination and curiosity about India. Indians living in the Soviet Union—there are 600 in Moscow alone—are treated with special affection and respect. Every Indian one meets has a story to relate of how strangers came up to them in the streets after the assassination of Indira Gandhi and embraced them with tears in their eyes and words of genuine sorrow and regret. It is an obsession that manifests itself in strange and heart-warming ways. In Minsk, a pretty 18-year-old Soviet girl gave a highly creditable performance of Bharatanatyam at a reception for journalists accompanying the prime minister. Later, it transpired that she had never been to India, never had a single lesson in her life and only learnt from watching documentaries and Indian films. Her real name is Marina but she insists that people call her Mira. In the apartment she shares with her mother, a plump, cheerful and hospitable woman, every available space is plastered with pictures she has painted herself and posters relating to India or figurines of Indian gods and goddesses. She has a stack of Indian records and every book on India ever printed in the Soviet Union. Her mother, like mothers anywhere in the world, expresses justifiable concern. "She is such a talented girl but she doesn't want to go to college. All she wants to do is dance. She dances two hours every day and she has only Indian friends. What am I to do with her?" But the exasperation is tinged with a certain pride in her daughter as well.

Other than her daughter's future, the mother has little else to complain about and most Soviet citizens one meets seem fairly happy and content with their lot. Certainly, the Soviet socialist system has what would be considered serious drawbacks in western and democratic societies in terms of freedom and choice, but it is a system that works and works fairly well —after a fashion.

AKALI DAL

Feuding Factions

WITH the first anniversary of Operation Bluestar approaching, the air in Punjab and neighbouring states was thick with fear and uncertainty. Where and how would the extremists strike next? This question worried many who expected some violent demonstration of the extremists' anger over last year's attack on the Golden Temple. And it was likely that the failure of Baba Joginder Singh's effort to wrest control of the Akali Dal from the party's traditional leadership, had added to the extremists' frustration.

The Akali power struggle dominated Punjab events last fortnight. The tortuous unity talks between Baba Joginder Singh and the Akali moderates led by Sant Harchand Singh Longowal came to naught, setting the stage for a confrontation in which the Longowal camp appeared to have come out on top, at least for the time being. Longowal's earlier resignation from the Dal presidentship, misconstrued by newspapers and others as capitulation to the extremists, served notice that Longowal was no longer willing to be used as cat's-paw by the extremists. At the same time it spurred the party delegates into taking an open stand against Baba Joginder Singh's committee and the forces it appeared to represent.

In the long run this development may prove to be a watershed in the Akali Dal's recent history. In the first few days after his resignation it had seemed that Longowal had bought trouble. This was because no one was sure whether SGPC chief G.S. Tohra and former chief minister Parkash Singh Badal would support him in the face of threats by the extremists. Badal in fact stayed away from many meetings addressed by Longowal, particularly a party conference at Bhawanigarh in Sangrur, where Tohra made it clear from the stage that he had thrown his lot with Longowal. The vacillating Badal declared his hand only after the Amritsar meeting on May 22 in which 23 out of 26 district jathedars rejected Longowal's resignation and spurned the ad hoc committee. "No single individual has a right to dissolve the Akali Dal," said the jathedars in a resolution. Confided Badal to INDIA TODAY a week later: "I cannot think of joining Baba's group, I would rather renounce politics and stay home. I cannot align myself with those whose politics I do not share. I did not go to Bhindranwale even when others were crowding around him." But Badal made it clear that he had high personal regard for Baba Joginder Singh.

Jathedars' meet in Amritsar; and (bottom) Joginder Singh with his ad hoc committee

The Baba himself responded to the challenge by calling a meeting of the truncated ad hoc committee and chastising the moderates for betraying the panth for petty gains. He expanded the committee and included many of Badal's former supporters, some MLA's and two former army generals. But very soon cracks became apparent and dissonant voices were heard from a faction of the All India Sikh Students Federation and the Damdami Taksal (which Bhindranwale had headed) against some members named by the Baba on the expanded committee.

BABA JOGINDER SINGH

"God will grant us sense"

FOR ALL intents and purposes he looks a sturdy, simple farmer well past his ploughing days. And he behaves like any crusty octogenarian would in a Punjab village. But there the resemblance ends. Baba Joginder Singh, 83, who was recently catapulted centre stage in Akali politics, is no ordinary peasant. He is the inheritor of a tumultuous legacy left behind by his son Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale. In a dynastic reversal he has stepped into his son's shoes and in the process created innumerable problems for the traditional Akali leadership, much as his son Jarnail Singh had done in his lifetime. In a bloodless coup, the Baba ousted the moderate Akali President Harchand Singh Longowal and named himself acting head of an ad hoc committee dominated by followers of the Bhindranwale creed.

But this time the Akali leaders decided to fight back and forced the party to take a stand against the hardliners. Longowal resigned, and so did former chief minister P.S. Badal and SGPC chief G.S. Tohra. But district jathedars of the Akali Dal rejected Sant Longowal's resignation, as did the SGPC working committee with Tohra's. Badal too was directed to stay on as leader of the Akali legislature party. In this way the moderate sections of the Akali Dal made it clear they would not buckle under threats of extremists and hardliners who have had Punjab at gunpoint these past few months. The ball was now back in the extremist court and the people of Punjab waited to see how the Baba and his committee would react to this unexpected challenge from the moderate camp. Correspondent GOBIND THUKRAL met Baba Joginder Singh twice in Amritsar to elicit his views on the challenge from the moderates. Excerpts:

Q. Was it proper for you to dissolve the two Akali Dals and form an ad hoc committee under your own stewardship?

A. Both Longowal and Talwandi had given me in writing that they would take whatever steps I thought best to bring unity in the panth at this critical and crucial hour and I decided to merge these two Dals and form a real Akali Dal, an organisation of martyrs and not self-seekers. I included all major leaders in the committee whose convenor was former IPS officer Simranjit Singh Mann.

Q. Why are these leaders staying away from this committee?

A. It is their smallness. They will realise their mistake soon.

Q. But what is the reason behind their rejecting your committee?

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

> "How can we shake hands with a person whose hands are soaked in our blood"

A. You ask them. How would I know it?

Q. The meeting of district and state presidents of the Akali Dal have rejected your ad hoc committee.

A. This meeting of the district leaders was not proper. They could not take up the issue of resignation of Longowal or the ad hoc committee after I merged the two Dals and formed the ad hoc committee. These leaders had ceased to hold their offices. They have no locus standi. Longowal and Talwandi had ceased to be presidents of their respective Dals after I merged them and announced the ad hoc committee.

Q. Do you think your efforts to unite the Akali leaders will succeed?

A. I have tried but with no success. It is painful. The chances of unity are not much but I have not given up. God will grant us some sense.

Q. District presidents have appealed to you to join the Sikh mainstream and work for the glory of the panth.

A. I am already in the mainstream. Ever since I remember I have been in the service of the panth, participating in the morchas in my own humble way and what else am I doing now?

Q. You had a long meeting with Akali leaders at Chandigarh. Did anything come out of it?

A. Nothing.

Q. Why?

A. Many of them are sticklers for their positions. They wanted me to dissolve the committee and accept their faction as the sole Akali Dal.

Q. Will you hold more meetings with them?

A. I do not mind meeting anybody but these should not be talking sessions. We must realise the gravity of the situation which the Sikhs and the country face.

Q. What is your political programme?

A. Khalse da bolbala Khalse di charhdi kala (Glory to the Sikhs).

Q. I am asking about your political programme.

A. Justice and peace in the country and the struggle for the acceptance of the Anandpur Sahib resolution.

Q. If the Government invites you for talks, will you go?

A. (After a pause) Are you pleading the case of the Government? How can I tell you?

Q. What is the way out to solve the Punjab problem? Don't you agree that issues can be best resolved through talks and not otherwise?

A. Only justice can ensure peace. How can one talk to an oppressor? The Delhi Government has indulged in the genocide of Sikhs. How can we shake hands with a person whose hands are soaked in our blood? Let the Government do us justice and the situation will normalise.

Q. What exactly should the Government do?

A. I say it should do justice and stop oppression.

came after two abortive meetings in which various formulae for unity were discussed. One proposal was to run the party by a five-member presidium comprising Longowal, Tohra, Badal, Talwandi and the Baba's son, Jagjit Singh Rode. This was not acceptable. The emerging confrontation in Akali politics seemed to move even a newspaper like the Akali Patrika of Jalandhar to anger. The paper which had once leant powerful support to Bhindranwale, complained editorially that "people who have no standing among the Sikhs have encircled the Baba and are using him for their own nefarious ends". This barb was apparently aimed at Jagdev Singh Talwandi who is believed to be the brain behind the move to "merge" the two Akali factions and sideline Longowal. Talwandi was not the only one accused of using the Baba. A similar charge was being made against former chief minister Darbara Singh and some other Congress (I) leaders, including Zora Singh Brar, Tarlochan Singh Riyasti and a former bureaucrat N.S. Meetha. The latter met the Baba's son Jagjit Singh in jail a couple of days before he was released. Jagjit Singh had then rushed to Amritsar to be present at the May 1 formation of the ad hoc committee which was set up to replace the Akali Dal.

But last fortnight Longowal proved his support in the party and distanced himself from the hardliners giving the Central Government a chance to think about resuming negotiations on the Punjab problem. A Central leader admitted that the Government had to wait for the Akali squabble to settle down before it took the next step. Recovering from gunshot wounds in Amritsar, AICC (I) General Secretary Raghunandan Lal Bhatia echoed the same thought: "All we want is that Akali politics should be settled. As long as it remains fluid the Punjab problem cannot be solved."

But this policy of waiting for the Akalis to sort out their differences did not find favour with Punjabi Forum leader I.K. Gujral. "The Government is asking for trouble if it adopts an attitude of sitting back and letting the gladiators fight it out. The trouble between the extremists and Akali moderates will continue and this should not delay any steps the Centre is prepared to take to solve the Punjab problem." Agreed Punjabi writer and academician Dr Attar Singh: "With people dilly-dallying, the situation is slipping out of hand every day."

He and others in Punjab are worried about the communal turn that incidents of terrorist violence are beginning to take. This happened when Hindus in Hindu-majority towns of Dhariwal and Hoshiarpur, retaliated against Sikhs following extremist attacks on Hindu leaders of the Congress(I) and Lok Dal. Hoshiarpur remained tense and under curfew more than a week after the May 10 shooting of Lok Dal leader Balbir Singh. This was followed by some violence at Ludhiana in which property was looted and damaged. The fragile communal peace that had prevailed in Punjab even after the November 1984 killings in Delhi, was beginning to crack.

Part of the reason is that militant bodies like the Punjab Shiv Sena have been distributing trishuls and other arms to the youth to confront terrorists. "We too are raising squads to match the terrorists," the fiery Shiv Sena chief tells his audiences. This reverse Bhindranwaleism may not daunt the terrorists but it creates adversarial feelings which erupt into the kind of communal incidents witnessed at Ludhiana, Hoshiarpur and Dhariwal.

Asserts Gujral: "The feeling of insecurity of Hindus in Punjab and Sikhs outside have reached a stage where unified action is now needed. The majority community inside and outside Punjab has to play a greater role to assure the security and dignity of the minority."

Amidst all this the one thing that keeps hope of a solution alive are the statements of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi that the Government would go to any length to find a way out of the morass that is Punjab. "But declarations are not enough," says Gujral. "He must see to it that his decisions are implemented. Rajiv had seized the political initiative, now he is losing it." It was unclear whether Rajiv would take the initiative again in the brief period between his return from Moscow and his departure for France and the United States in early June. But just before embarking on his Soviet tour, he had called in former external affairs minister Swaran Singh for a long discussion. Singh on his part would not say what transpired at the meeting. But he did come away with the impression that Rajiv appeared to be genuinely keen on a speedy settlement.

Meanwhile most people realised that the terrorists could be waiting to strike again in the first week of June. So did Longowal who in an appeal for peace asked all Akalis only to organise prayers at home and gurudwaras in memory of Sikhs killed during and after Operation Bluestar. "At no cost provoke or get provoked," he warned. Longowal ended his appeal with a significant sentence: "I want to tell the people of the world that we go only by the directive of the Gurus—all are brothers here. There is no outsider among us." The message was clear, as also the direction in which it was aimed.

SIKH TERRORISTS

Foiled Plot

MURDER and mayhem are no strangers to the world of the Punjab extremist. But if police reports are to be believed, one group of terrorists was recently thwarted in its plans to deal what by any standards would have been a deadly blow: attempts on the lives of President Zail Singh and other top Central leaders. According to a confessional statement of a suspect, the attack on the President was to be made in Patiala, which he was scheduled to visit in March to attend a grandson's wedding. The visit was called off and the plot fell through.

According to intelligence sources, the plot came to light when the police arrested one Ram Singh of Chandigarh last fortnight. He was picked up for his alleged connections with Gurinder Singh, a suspected terrorist who was arrested on May 4. Gurinder, who later died in Chandigarh's Post-Graduate Medical Institute apparently after being tortured by the police, was a prime suspect in the killing of Bharatiya Janata Party leader K.L. Manchanda on March 24. Gurinder's interrogation led to the subsequent arrest of Ram Singh, Kulwant Singh and two others.

According to information received in Delhi, Ram Singh at first seemed to have little information of value. But then, put under pressure by police officials specially sent from Delhi, he disclosed that the group had plans to do away with the President and other important leaders. Ram Singh's confessional statement was sent by the Punjab police to the special branch of Delhi police and has led to the tightening up of security around the President and others.

The report says: "Ram Singh admitted to being a member of the extremist group led by Gurinder Singh alias Sander Singh who was arrested by the Chandigarh police." Kulwant Singh had earlier told his interrogators that the group had plans to kill various VIP's but Ram Singh refers specifically to a plot to "assassinate the President of India". According to the police report, Ram Singh is said to have admitted that he and his associates carried several firearms including a Sten gun, three pistols and four hand-grenades on a reconnoitering trip to Patiala and had decided to make their attempt when he passed beneath a welcome gate erected near the rest-house of the Public Works Department.

The confessional statement also talks about terrorist contacts in the Punjab police when it says that the "Sten gun was to be operated by Harjit Singh, a police constable from Ludhiana, who was to be on duty in police uniform near the gate". It is not clear whether Harjit was a policeman or was to masquerade as one.

Although the President has, along with others, been on the extremist hit list, no concrete evidence of any plans had come to light so far. Even so, it has been felt unsafe for him to travel to Punjab and he was obliged to miss the Patiala wedding on the insistence of security officials. Obviously the caution was justified. The first inkling came in a daily bulletin of the Intelligence Bureau (IB) soon after the arrest of Gurinder Singh and his fellow conspirators. The IB, which has made some inroads into the extremist network in Punjab, had reported the possibility of a terrorist attempt on the President's life.

HARI OM GULATI

Ram Singh disclosed that the group had plans to do away with the President and other important leaders.

Ram Singh's disclosures have already created problems in the faction-ridden Punjab Pradesh Congress(I) Committee (PPCC-I). A section of the PPCC(I), led by the state's Youth Congress president, Pratap Singh Bajwa, has already alleged in public that Gurinder Singh was a known protege of PPCC(I) chief Santokh Singh Randhawa. Bajwa and his men last month made a representation to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi alleging that the two—Gurinder and Randhawa—were very close. Randhawa has denied these allegations as being baseless.

But, four of Gurinder's associates rushed to New Delhi soon after his arrest in what is interpreted to be an attempt to get a top functionary of the Congress(I) to intercede with the police on his behalf. The four not only found themselves a room in Punjab Bhawan, they were also seen at a meeting of the All India Congress(I) Committee which was then in plenary session. Although their presence was spotted by an AICC(I) office-bearer, they were able to get away without any problem.

The Bajwa faction alleged in its memorandum that the Gurinder gang was all set to weed out those Congressmen who were against the ruling faction within the PPCC(I) which is led by Randhawa. In a countermove, the Randhawa group has charged the Bajwa faction of harbouring terrorists and, indeed, admitting them into the party's youth wing. The allegations and counter-allegations have not been taken lightly by the party which has instructed Governor Arjun Singh to look into them.

This is the first time that such accusations have been traded by the ruling party's opposing factions. Interestingly, the police suspects that the ammunition used by Gurinder's gang in an encounter with the police on May 4, when two constables were killed, was similar to the ammunition recovered after the attempt on the life of AICC(I) General Secretary R.L. Bhatia on April 19 in Amritsar. According to a statement made by Jalandhar police chief S. Virk, the constables were killed by .45 Colts. Similar bullets were recovered after the attack on Bhatia and the murder of three others the same day.

The Akali Dal led by Harchand Singh Longowal has been demanding a judicial inquiry into the role of the Congress(I) in the recent killings in Punjab, convinced that they are a result of its internal squabbles. The ruling party will have to do more than offer platitudes if these bizarre allegations are to be properly refuted.

THE PRESIDENT

A Communication Gap

FOR WEEKS, the two had not met, and the press had begun to speculate on the reasons. Now Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi was getting ready to visit the Soviet Union. President Zail Singh seemed to expect that the prime minister would come calling before the visit, for he left some gaps in his daily calendar of appointments. But no meeting materialised.

This is not the first time that a prime minister has gone on a state visit without first calling on the President: Mrs Gandhi did it a couple of times. But then she made up by reporting to the President after the visits. And the question now lingered: would Rajiv Gandhi ask for a meeting after he was back in Delhi?

Whether he does or doesn't, all the signs point to a lack of proper communication, perhaps even a rift, between the head of state and the head of government. The last time they met before their chance coming together at a function to mark the 21st death anniversary of Jawaharlal Nehru was in late March, at the formal swearing-in of Chandrashekhar Singh as textile minister. And the last time Rajiv formally called on the President was even further back in history, in mid-February. Since then, a great deal has happened in the country: the failure of Rajiv's Baisakhi initiative, the bomb blasts in north India, the Government's foreign policy initiative in relation to its neighbours, and the budget session of Parliament. On none of these, it seemed, had the prime minister considered it necessary to personally brief the President.

To add grist to the mill, Zail Singh's state visit to Zimbabwe and Zambia in mid-May had been called off at the Government's initiative, but Rajiv had merely spoken to the President on the telephone and sent Minister of State for External Affairs Khurshid Alam Khan to inform the President of the reasons for this decision. The decision itself was taken on May 8, but announced only two days later, on the evening of the bomb blasts. And the official reason, first disclosed as "reasons of state", was subsequently changed to "urgent affairs of state"—a terminological shift whose final significance remains quite obscure.

The use of Khurshid Alam Khan as an emissary fits into a pattern, for Rajiv's normal channel of communication with the President in other contexts has been his Parliamentary Secretary, Arun Singh. And on the Punjab issue, K.C. Pant briefed the President once on May 13. But the President can hardly be happy with a situation where he has to deal with the prime minister's aides, and not the prime minister himself. And Pant is no substitute for the Punjab Governor, Arjun Singh, who has yet to call on the President after he was sworn in last March.

Other unreported events have contributed to the growing pile of evidence suggesting that all is not well between Rashtrapati Bhavan and South Block. Zail Singh had hoped to visit Udhagamangalam in Tamil Nadu and Darjeeling in West Bengal, but the arrangements were not made promptly enough, and he had to give up his travel plans. The only exception to this list of aborted trips was the President's planned visit to Mount Abu from May 29 to 31. But the nagging question remained: why was the Government seemingly anxious to keep the President in New Delhi?

> All the signs point to a lack of proper communication, perhaps even a rift, between the head of state and head of government.

Several conjectures have been made in the press about the reasons for the apparent rift. Zail Singh was upset at the fact that while bravery awards were being given to defence personnel the official press release referred to the role played by some of them in Operation Bluestar. This was despite such a mention being removed from the formal citation. Zail Singh complained to Rajiv Gandhi on this issue, but no convincing explanation has apparently been forthcoming.

From the South Block point of view, media reports have mentioned allegations that politicians close to Zail Singh visited Bhindranwale's step-brother, Jagjit Singh Rode, in Sangrur jail before the formation of the ad hoc committee headed by Baba Joginder Singh, Bhindranwale's father. There is also the case cited of Inderjit Singh Sekhon, initially appointed secretary of the committee, who had in the past been Zail Singh's election agent and who in his application for release from detention under the National Security Act had detailed his "services" to the Congress(I) and Zail Singh.

Whether these mean anything or not is of course far from clear. Any Punjab politician is bound to have numerous historical links with people whose current alliances may be less than desirable. And the President has told his confidants that many of the people who are supposed to be acting on his behalf had turned against him some time ago, including Sekhon. Some of them had in fact submitted memorandums against Zail Singh to Mrs Gandhi. One presidential aide added that extremists cannot be visited in jail without government permission. Nevertheless, the President has been sufficiently worried by the rumours about him to instruct the Government that he does not want to see any intelligence reports on Punjab. This may or may not have something to do with the charges aired privately and in the media that information was in fact being leaked out from Rashtrapati Bhavan to various elements in Punjab.

Sources close to the President say that the rift with the prime minister has little to do with Punjab, on which issue Zail Singh is in the unenviable position of being denounced by the Akalis as being a government stooge, and by some people in government for having promoted Bhindranwale in the past. By this account, the rift relates to what is apparently an underlying lack of trust.

The President is known to have attributed the lack of mutual trust to the activities of some prime ministerial aides. As for the pinpricks, one example is the Government's refusal to extend the term in Delhi of I.S. Bindra, joint secretary to the President. Zail Singh asked for the extension three times, but the Government has stuck to its guns and argued that Bindra's five-year term in Delhi is over, and that he should now revert to his Punjab cadre. Matters have not been improved by the Government's clearing of the extension by a year of the services of the Secretary to the President, A.C. Bandhopadhyaya.

But the issue that has brought matters to a boil is the debate in the Lok Sabha on two overseas Sikhs with alleged pro-Khalistan views who were supposed to have stayed in Rashtrapati Bhavan in 1983 as Zail Singh's guests (INDIA TODAY, May 15). The President is understood to have listened to the comments in Parliament on the direct microphone system linked to Rashtrapati Bhavan, then waited for the official transcripts of the speeches, and then complained to the prime minister. Reliable sources say the President felt that the debate should not have been allowed to take place, and that on a similar occasion in the past when Parliament wanted to discuss the conduct of then President N. Sanjiva Reddy, he (Zail Singh) as home minister had prevailed on Mrs Gandhi to prevent such a debate. He is also believed to have pointed out that the question did not relate to Zail Singh as a person but to the institution of the presidency, which should be kept above controversy.

The prime minister's response to this extraordinary and perhaps unprecedented complaint was curt, and apparently delayed. Rajiv Gandhi merely pointed out that he could not stifle parliamentary debate, and that MP's were free to speak their mind. That could hardly have improved relations between the two, though Rajiv later told the President that K.K. Tiwari, the Congress(I) MP who raised the issue, had been advised not to repeat his performance.

Meanwhile, advisers with access to Rajiv Gandhi have taken note of the fact that the President was meeting numerous leaders of the ruling party, especially old Sanjay Gandhi loyalists. The suspicion may well have arisen as to whether the President was winning the confidence of Congress(I) "dissidents".

In Zail Singh's defence, it is argued that he has from the beginning made himself accessible to hopeful callers, and that his meetings with members of Parliament are no more than a part of this consciously adopted presidential style. Nevertheless, the interpretations being given to his meetings with Congress(I) leaders have clearly reached Zail Singh, for suddenly he has reduced his meetings with MP's from the ruling party. His daily list of appointments makes the change in attitude abundantly clear.

While some aides close to the President have given an indication of Zail Singh's mind on these and other issues, what the prime minister thinks remains a secret. Nevertheless, stray remarks by Rajiv Gandhi's aides indicate that the prime minister may have revised his understanding of the role being played by the President in current affairs.

If the conclusion is inescapable that there is trouble at the top, there is as yet no indication of how serious it is, or whether the relationship between the two might yet take a turn for the better. This is not the first time that a President and prime minister have had their differences: Rajendra Prasad had a sharp conflict of views with Nehru on the changes in Hindu personal law, Mrs Gandhi bridled at some of the advice given to her by S. Radhakrishnan, and there was little love lost between N. Sanjiva Reddy and Morarji Desai in the closing months of the Janata Government. In the immediate context, a President with a rustic background who has had a long innings as a politician of the old school may also find himself out of step with a government run essentially by urban sophisticates. Whether the current differences and suspicions relate to something beyond such inconsequential circumstances and whether it surpasses the level of differences between earlier presidents and prime ministers is now the key question. So the always delicate relationship between the head of state and the head of government in a still evolving democracy might well make for more headlines in the coming weeks.

ASSASSINATION TRIAL

A Slow Process

THEY were a study in contrasts as they sat on a bench inside the bullet-proof booth. At one end was constable Satwant Singh, alleged assassin of Mrs Gandhi, looking younger than his 22 years, with tufts of hair around his chin in an otherwise clean face. His blue pugree and flowing cream Pathan-style salwar-kameez were striking enough but what held the eye was an open saffron pugree draped around his neck. His intense eyes kept darting around the courtroom and were not afraid to look people in the eye, but he still seemed restless and bored. His knowledge of English is known to be fragmentary but he was following enough of what was being said to occasionally call his lawyer, P.N. Lekhi, and whisper something in his ears. When he got up he moved so effortlessly it seemed his body had adjusted to the one bullet still lodged in his spine.

In the middle was Delhi Police sub-inspector Balbir Singh. Dressed in a check bush shirt, he had allowed his beard to grow into an unruly mop which made his stout face look even bigger and gave his eyes a fierce look. Language was no problem with him—on the third day he addressed the judge in faultless English, but he was clearly living in a world of his own. He carried with him a file containing a sheaf of papers on which he was constantly scribbling away furiously. (Tihar jail sources say he has been writing tomes on the 'maltreatment' of Sikhs.)

Sitting a little away from the two, dressed in a nondescript old shirt and trousers, was Kehar Singh, uncle of Beant Singh, the other assassin of Mrs Gandhi who was killed. Sitting more upright than most at his age can manage, he was keenly watching the proceedings and appeared to be the only one of the three who was following the trend of arguments in court.

For a court that is to try those accused of killing a prime minister, even the conditions were anything but regal. Security reasons dictated that the trial had to be held inside maximum security prison No. 3 in the Tihar jail, where the undertrials are lodged. A box-like room, barely 400 sq ft, with three windows which too remain shut for security reasons, was converted into a makeshift courtroom. When the Additional Sessions Judge, Mahesh Chandra, the battery of lawyers, relatives of the accused and media representatives—40 people on an average each day, took their place in the small room it seemed to further shrink in size.

Clearly, the authorities were taking no chances. A truck-load of policemen were stationed at the inner gate of the jail premises. A plainclothesman took down the addresses and names and collected copies of photographs of reporters allowed to attend the trial. Every vehicle entering the jail premises was stopped and thoroughly checked. Everybody was frisked at the door of the courtroom and then checked by a metal detector. In the courtroom, the three accused were herded into a bullet-proof booth, approximately 24 sq ft, with a narrow entrance from the end facing the wall to the left of the judge.

The setting was striking enough but the beginning of the trial into the assassination of Mrs Gandhi was bogged down in procedural wranglings. Four hearings were held last fortnight but the prosecution did not even get the chance to show its hand. Still, drama was not lacking. When security men objected to the presence of Satwant's father, Tirlochan Singh, and were preventing him from entering the courtroom on the first day of the hearings, Lekhi too refused to enter the court in protest till Singh was allowed in. "Let them hold the trial without me," he railed.

That day the court sat for barely 20 minutes, Chandra having to adjourn the proceedings because no lawyer seemed ready to defend Balbir Singh. But the little time was enough for Lekhi to show that he was going to try every trick in the trade. First he brought to the attention of the court that he had not been served with a formal notice indicating the start of the proceedings. When Chandra offered to issue a fresh notice, Lekhi shot back: "The court is ignorant about the rules." Then he moved an application on Satwant's behalf arguing that Satwant and the others should be discharged because Desraj Kakkar, member of the CBI team headed by Anand Ram investigating the case, had not been appointed to the team through a gazette notification nor under the relevant section of the Delhi Police Act of 1978. The prosecution lawyers successfully countered the charge but it was clear that Lekhi would be looking for every possible legal loophole.

When the court met a week later, Balbir was still to get a lawyer. Asked by Chandra whether he had decided on a lawyer, Balbir replied: "I do not trust strangers." The court wrote to the registrar to appoint a lawyer but Balbir had still not got one and it seemed the issue could become intractable.

On the third day of the proceedings, Kehar Singh's wife moved an application that her son, Rajinder Singh, had been wrongfully detained under the National Security Act. Kehar Singh's lawyer, P.P. Grover, pleaded that the court should initiate contempt of court proceedings against three officials of the Anand Ram team on the grounds that Rajinder Singh had been detained on the basis of a "forged" order.

Lekhi has clearly decided that offence is the best defence. Early last month Satwant Singh filed an application denying having made a confession on December 1, 1984, and claiming that his signature had been forged on the statement. Charging the prosecution with fabricating evidence, he said: "The bullets came from many directions. But the prosecution does not look into other directions. I am surprised." Lekhi also told pressmen that he was going to raise the issue of a "missing" assassin and that he would be contesting the authenticity of the post-mortem on Mrs Gandhi. Even the media was not spared: Lekhi also castigated the press for referring to Satwant as the "lone surviving assassin of Mrs Gandhi". Indicating his perception of the case, Lekhi later said: "We are now entered in a regular trial of a classic murder like that of Kennedy, Gandhi, Liaquat Ali," and then quaintly added, "and also Lord Krishna who died of a political murder 3,000 years ago about which nobody knows."

It is unlikely, however, that Lekhi is going to reopen such an old case: his hands are going to be full in trying to demolish the official version of the assassination. When the hot and cramped courtroom comes alive in the coming weeks it is certain that Satwant will take an even greater interest in the court proceedings.

GUJARAT

Strife Torn

AS THE turmoil in Gujarat continued for the fourth straight month, the death toll crossed 120—the highest ever in any agitation; even the 1974 Navnirman stir had, at 104, claimed fewer lives. The agitation had started off as a protest against increased reservations but by last fortnight there was no focus to the violence—stray stabbings and arson were the rule. The army was still out in Ahmedabad and Baroda but the violence had spread to Surat, Viramgam, Godhra, Anand, Nadiad, and Kadi and Sidhpur in Mehsana district which has a history of tension between the savarnas (higher castes) and Harijans.

Nor was any end to the strife in sight. Negotiations between the Vali Mahamandal and the Navrachna Samiti, leading the anti-reservation agitation, and the Madhavsinh Solanki Government failed as the former insisted on the ordering of a judicial inquiry into police atrocities as a pre-condition for any talks. Asked Dr Gaurang Shah, spokesman of the Samiti: "If the Government is as innocent as it makes itself out to be, why does it hesitate to order an inquiry?" It is certain that there will be trouble when schools reopen in early June.

Nor is that all. Barely had the Government heaved a sigh of relief when the panchayat employees and junior doctors called off their strike, when the 3.6 lakh state government employees threatened to go on an indefinite strike from June 7. The employees are demanding abolition of the roster system which gives accelerated promotion to Scheduled Caste and Scheduled Tribe (SC/ST) employees. In an entirely expected backlash, SC/ST employees filed a writ in the high court asking for a stay of the reported government decision to implement the main recommendations of the Sadhwani Commission, appointed to look into anomalies in the roster system. The commission's findings have gone against the interests of the SC/ST employees.

The long agitation has taken various forms—a caste war, a communal conflict, a people versus the police war—and it was clear that people were taking no chances. Intelligence agencies reported that illegal arms were flooding the state and confirmation of this came quickly as caches of private arms were seized from Ahmedabad, Jamnagar, Porbandar and several small towns in Mehsana district. When fire brigade men rushed to douse an entire slum in the eastern Ahmedabad suburb of Saraspur which was up in flames, they were taken aback when the battling communities opened up a fusillade of bullets. This is the first time that firearms have been used by rioters in Ahmedabad and the police feel that they still had to make many major catches.

The state Government sought to seize the initiative by promulgating an "anti-goonda" ordinance, which gives it powers to detain antisocial elements for one year. The ordinance was welcomed by the people even as some opposition parties made muted protests.

Meanwhile, there was hectic political activity also though most of it went around in predictable circles. In Delhi, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi held a meeting with Gujarat MP's, including from the Opposition, to seek "concrete suggestions". Most of the MP's pleaded for a political solution and some Congress(I) MP's even reportedly made bold to say that Solanki should go. A delegation of opposition MP's, led by Janata Party's Madhu Dandavate, which paid a brief visit to Ahmedabad, also demanded Solanki's dismissal.

Solanki's detractors in Gujarat also turned the heat on him. Jinabhai Darji, once Solanki's political mentor and now leader of the dissidents, wired Rajiv to impose President's rule. Close on his heels, former health minister Manoharsinh Jadeja and former minister of state for education Balwant Munawar lashed out against the Government's sloppy handling of the situation and hinted that Solanki should go. But AICC(I) general secretary Chandulal Chandrakar reiterated that the high command was not thinking on those lines.

Solanki (right) at a meeting with anti-reservationists

Trade and industry were still at a standstill in Ahmedabad as the estimated business loss crossed Rs 350 crore. Fear and distrust still ruled. And perhaps the saddest example of the senseless violence was the death of six-year-old Bina Jhala. Daughter of an accident surveyor in the General Insurance Company, Bina was playing in the centre room of their two-room tenement in Naranpura, when a stray bullet fired by a jawan of the Kerala Armed Police hit her and killed her on the spot. The state of Gujarat was just as pitiable as that of Bina's parents.

CONGRESS(S)

Winds of Change

IN ITS short life of seven-odd years the Congress(S) has been weakened by four splits. Today, it has a bare three MP's in the Lok Sabha and two in the Rajya Sabha. Yet, if the party is still relevant nationally, the credit for this goes largely to its charismatic president, 44-year-old Sharad Govindrao Pawar. But last fortnight it seemed the very future of the party was in question as speculation hit political circles that Pawar was to join the Congress (I) and his party merge into the ruling party. The Congress (S) Working Committee even met to discuss the twin issues (officially, only the "overall political situation in the country" was discussed) but a sharp division within its ranks prevented any decision. Seemingly, the issue will now be decided after a meeting of district-level office-bearers in June. Pawar himself flew off for a three-week trip abroad but it was increasingly evident that Pawar's leaving the party was only a matter of time.

Publicly, of course, the party's leaders were denying any such possibility. When press speculation about this first appeared last month, party Secretary K.P. Unnikrishnan called a press conference to deride the media for carrying "Congress(I)-inspired speculative stories" and announced categorically: "I want to emphatically deny the news appearing in a section of the press that Sharad Pawar has been having talks with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi or any other Congress (I) leader or that he is going to accept any office." Pawar himself, as cagey as ever, told the media after the working committee meeting on May 18: "I am enjoying the reports about my joining the Congress(I). There is no question because neither have I received any such offer nor have I thought about it."

Rumours about the possible merger were set off by Pawar himself. Speaking at a social function at Pune in April, Pawar asserted that it was only "Congress culture" that could save the country from fragmentation and went on to say that Rajiv Gandhi should be supported by all in solving national problems. INDIA TODAY learns that moves towards a merger originated within the party even earlier. Soon after the Pawar-led Progressive Democratic Front (PDF) failed to dislodge the Congress (I) in the March Assembly elections in Maharashtra, Pawar's followers in the state led by Rajya Sabha MP Suresh Kalmadi started pressurising him to join the Congress (I). Kalmadi, a former Indian Air Force pilot known to have contacts with Rajiv's advisers (Gandhi's parliamentary Secretary, Arun Singh, who rarely accepts invitations from politicians was conspicuous by his presence last month at a dinner hosted by Kalmadi) even got the Congress (I) to extend an offer to Pawar.

Pawar's flirtation with the Congress(I) is based on his conviction that it is futile to plough a lonely furrow.

A senior Congress (S) leader revealed that Pawar has had five meetings with Gandhi since the assembly poll, the latest of which took place on May 1 and lasted for over an hour. Pawar does not deny the meetings but characteristically maintained that they only discussed various national problems.

According to Congress (S) insiders, Pawar's decision to throw the question of his party's identity open for debate is based on his conviction that it is futile to plough a lonely furrow. In the last year Pawar has emerged as one of the leading opposition leaders in the country but power still continues to elude him even though the PDF gave the Congress (I) a fright by finishing with 106 MLA's to the latter's 162 in the 288-member house. Pawar then attempted, in vain, to woo over the 50-odd MLAs he would need to form a government. Said a senior Congress (S) leader from Maharashtra: "We have two options in Maharashtra: remain in the PDF and wait for it to die a natural death or join the Congress (I). Obviously the latter is more judicious."

Pawar began drifting away from opposition parties after his efforts to forge issues-based opposition unity failed. He was particularly upset when the PDF collapsed within two months, letting the Shiv Sena stage a come-back in the Bombay municipal elections in late April. Admitted a Congress (S) leader from Kerala: "Pawar cannot become an accepted national opposition leader so why should he allow his Maharashtra base to be eroded by wasting his time in fruitless national politics?"

But Pawar's inclination to change took concrete shape after the Congress (I) dangled the carrot of the chief ministership of Maharashtra. He was given to understand that relations between Vasantrao Patil and Gandhi were strained and, had an alternative been available, Patil would have been replaced. Pawar's emissaries have made it clear to Gandhi that they would come over only if Pawar was made the chief minister and the Congress (I) agreed to stop treating the state as a fiefdom of New Delhi.

That, however, was not the only reason for the delay. Pawar wants to strengthen his base in Maharashtra even further by sweeping the zilla parishad elections due in September. Moreover, a section in the party, led by Unnikrishnan, is opposed to the merger. Unnikrishnan, Kerala Congress (S) President P.C. Chacko and S.C. Sinha, former Assam chief minister, warned against the merger at the working committee meeting. But since none of the other leaders has a mass base like Pawar, their views are unlikely to prevail.

Officially, the Congress (I) also was keeping mum on the confabulations. But Maharashtra Finance Minister, Sushil Kumar Shinde, known to be a close friend of Pawar, declared in Pune that Pawar would soon join the Congress (I) without any preconditions. Shinde also clarified that he was merely expressing the views of Rajiv Gandhi. Till late last fortnight, the minister's version had not been denied.

THE FASTEST 16-BIT COMPUTER HAS JUST ENTERED THE RACE.

The Uptron S-1650 has been designed to take throughput to dizzying levels.

For starters, there are separate processors for separate functions — seven to be precise. These perform I/O operations, transfer data to and from memory, between memory and peripheral devices and communicate with the user. Such a symmetrically optimised architecture naturally leaves the CPU free to do what it does best — number crunching. Additional support is provided to the CPU by a numeric co-processor that works with it in a unique dual-clock architecture.

In its full-blown configuration, the Uptron S-1650 is a 16 terminal system that supports twenty printers and a wide array of peripheral devices. It's one of the few systems that allows batch processing from any terminal, in a multi-user environment. It also permits foreground/background processing on a terminal.

Each set of eight terminals is handled by a 16-bit microprocessor. This ensures uniformly fast terminal response times, no matter what the number of terminals.

The memory also superbly serves a multi-user, time sharing environment. It is interleaved 1:8, dynamically partitioned and the block sizes are configurable.

So make no mistake about it. The Uptron S-1650 is the fastest 16-bit computer in a multi-user environment. The fastest.

To know more about it, write to Uptron. Fast.

ANTULAY CASE

Halfway Off the Hook

THOUGH the case began with a spectacular bang in the Bombay High Court last March, the gist of the final order of Justice Dinshaw Mehta last month as to whether criminal cases could be framed against A.R. Antulay suggested that it might peter out in a whimper. It seemed Antulay was halfway off the hook already.

Defence lawyers were jubilant. Said Nitin Pradhan: "It is a major victory," while Rajendra Desai added, "Most of the charges levelled by the press have proved baseless." Antulay himself, recuperating in London from a triple coronary bypass operation, expressed his happiness over the phone to his lawyers and announced that he would be back in Bombay when the court opens after vacation on June 10.

Ramdas Nayak, BJP corporater who is the first private citizen to take action under the Prevention of Corruption Act, insisted, however, that the "order was a victory for the judiciary. Even if one case is upheld our stand is vindicated." But prosecution lawyer Mahesh Jethmalani announced that they would be appealing in the Supreme Court.

Rejecting the prosecution's draft criminal charges of cheating under section 420 IPC, extortion (384 IPC) and conspiracy (120 IPC), Justice Mehta held that only charges relating to misuse of office under section 161 and 165 of the IPC read along with section of the Prevention of Corruption Act could be framed against Antulay. Besides, the charges will be only in regard to 18 cases of cement allotment and three relating to the alleged nexus between restoring a cut in manufacturing industrial alcohol by sugar mills and donations to the trusts.

The prosecution's most publicised draft charge concerning the sugar cooperatives' claim that they had been duped into believing that the Indira Gandhi Pratibha Pratisthan (IGPP) was a government trust and that the money had been extorted under false pretences was rejected. The prosecution's star witness, Shalinitai Patil, described by Mehta as "no ordinary housewife but a lawyer by training...and, it is safe to assume, a shrewd politician", had testified that she realised that the IGPP was a private trust only in August 1981, whereas there was evidence that she was well aware of the position much earlier being the then state revenue minister.

A bigger blow was the rejection of the draft charges relating to the National Centre for Performing Arts (NCPA) donation and the granting of no objection certificate (NOC) to Nanubhai Jewellers for renting out its premises. The prosecution saw these as watertight cases and had hoped to indict Ajit Kerkar, managing director of Tata's Indian Hotels and a trustee of the IGPP, as a co-accused. But Justice Mehta found no nexus between the payment of Rs 26 lakh on March 31, 1981 to the trust by the NCPA and a government resolution of May 6, 1981, since the resolution did not support the proposal suggested by Kerkar for increasing the floor space index (FSI) of the NCPA plot. The prosecution held that Kerkar's intention was established even if the deed fell through.

(From top) Jethmalani, Antulay and Justice Mehta: anti-climax

HARI OM GULATI

NAMAS BHOJANI

In the NOC matter, the testimony of witness Ramesh Merchant of Nanubhai Jewellers—that though Antulay had asked him to donate to his trusts, he had made clear that the NOC would be obtained only in the normal course—greatly strengthened the defence's hand.

Even while accepting that there was prima facie evidence of a nexus in 18 cement allotments, Justice Mehta rejected the conspiracy charge. The crux of Nayak's complaint had been that Antulay had systematically devised a scheme for disbursement of government largesse in return for payment to the trust and that others such as P.G. Gavai, Ram Batra, Pesi Tata, Ajit Kerkar and N.M. Tidke were part of the conspiracy.

Though the builders' cheques found their way into the trust coffers, the cement allotment orders do not bear Antulay's signature. Nor did the builders—the Rehejas, Govanis, Ladhanis and Navketan—have direct dealings with Antulay. They testified that they were approached by one Pesi Tata for donations in return for cement and that they had handed their cheques to Tata. Tata, is, however, dead, and so is Ram Batra, a former sheriff, also alleged to have been a middle man.

From the evidence presented so far all that is established is that Tata was in the liquor business, a Parsi, with no connection with the Tata firm. He wore a safari suit, carried a Dupont pen, drove a Mercedes, and was a member of the exclusive Willingdon Gymkhana. Some witnesses claim that they saw him in the former chief minister's waiting room, others in the Mantralaya corridors, but so far the link with Antulay remains nebulous. The closest to establishing a relationship was the testimony of the then secretary of food and civil supplies, V.T. Chari, who had noted on a cement file on June 24, 1981, that Antulay had informed him that one P.D. Tata would be handing over to him a list of 58 cement applications indicating the quantity of cement to be sanctioned. There is, however, a counter-note from Antulay asking Chari to withdraw the noting. The prosecution had unsuccessfully tried to prove that the Antulay writing was inserted much later. Chari's original noting on the file is now missing and only a photocopy remains. Tata, was also the link man, according to Anil Kumar Ruia, in restoring the cut of 20 per cent industrial alcohol for the Kolhapur Sugar Mills, Kolhapur Sugarcane Works and United Agencies.

Last fortnight Justice Mehta's order was still not officially released but he announced the gist in court. After the vacation Mehta will start hearings on the preliminary charges against Antulay framed by former Janata MLA P.B. Samant. These include the state Government's donation of Rs 2 crore to the trust under false pretences.

An unpleasant aspect of the hearings has been the partisan and indecorous attitude adopted by both sides. While the defence has charged that it has been a trial by the irresponsible press, Antulay accused the Supreme Court of "descending to an obscenity" by transferring his case directly to the high court and claimed it had "bent the law to accommodate its own particular wish in a particular case against a particular individual". Jethmalani similarly upset the judiciary's feeling when he demanded the removal of Justice S.N. Khatri on the grounds that he had lost confidence after discovering that Khatri happened to be deputy law secretary when Antulay was law minister.

Jethmalani, who has made the case his mission for the last four years, has provided his services free in the interest of establishing that no man is above the law, and Antulay symbolised the corruption of the system. But his moral stand has lost some edge considering the roster of his clients who have successfully staved off conviction—Manu Narang, Haji Mastan and Yusuf Patel.

Inevitably comparisons are being made between the Antulay case and other show trials such as the Shah Commission and "Kissa Kursi Ka" which, eventually led to no conviction.

While the Antulay criminal charges are receiving all the attention the civil case against him went almost unnoticed when it came up in the Supreme Court in January this year. The Court upheld Justice Lentin's contention that quid pro quo had been established in the cement allotment. "That in itself should be enough indictment against any political figure," feels legal luminary Ashok Desai.

BIHAR

Allegations of Murder

POLITICAL killings are so common in Bihar that they no longer make news unless some political heavyweights are dragged into it. The murder of five Communist Party of India (CPI) men at Modanganj in Gaya district would not have hit the headlines had the party not accused 'King' Mahendra Prasad, controversial Congress(I) MP, of ordering the killing. Prasad had lost in the Lok Sabha election to the CPI's Ramashray Prasad Singh and the CPI alleged that the killings were part of Prasad's plan to avenge his defeat. The episode even had an echo in Delhi with the CPI leaders petitioning Rajiv Gandhi for Prasad's arrest.

Prasad, however, was equally vehement in denying any involvement. Sitting in the thickly-carpeted drawing-room of his MP's bungalow in Delhi (he was later elected to the Rajya Sabha), Prasad told INDIA TODAY that he had been framed in this "ghastly episode" as a result of a conspiracy hatched by his political opponents. Prasad alleged that a Bihar minister opposed to him had plotted along with a lawyer who is the minister's brother and a CPI sympathiser and the CPI MP, Ramashray Prasad Singh. "It's below my dignity to fight with a small man like Singh," said Prasad, and added, "if I wanted to take revenge why should I get these poor people killed and not Singh who is supposed to be my political opponent?"

Prasad alleges that the Indian People's Front (IPF), a Naxalite organisation which draws its strength mainly from the Harijans, is behind the killings. A fortnight ago, said Prasad, some Yadavs had killed a Dusadh Harijan, who was in the IPF, in nearby Maima village. The Modanganj killing, Prasad maintains, was the IPF's revenge—all those killed were Yadavs.

The police, who are now swarming the area, are weighing all the possibilities. "We have not closed our mind to the allegations regarding Mahendra Prasad," said Anil Kumar Pandey, DIG, who has been touring the area to defuse the tension. But the police do not rule out

It was news for us too. But that was eleven years ago when Rajdoot was the first Indian motorbike to 'go' Japanese.

Collaborating with MIKUNI—the world-famous makers of carburettors.

And that signalled a technology avalanche.

FUJI for clutch assemblies. HOSHI for swaged spokes. And KAYABA for front-forks.

Which means that there's a lot of Japanese know-how making the Rajdoot a very efficient machine.

And, when you add the hottest name in motorcycle engineering world-wide—Yamaha of Japan—it makes big news in the form of the Rajdoot-Yamaha breed of 350 cc motorbikes. Soon to be followed by the highly fuel-efficient 100 cc bikes.

Yes, the foresight is paying off. Because today, one of every two bikes on the road is a Rajdoot.

Which, incidentally, is not very surprising news.

the caste factor either. As Pandey pointed out, all the deceased are of one caste while all the accused are Bhumihars, like Prasad.

But the CPI rejects the caste theory. The FIR, it points out, has named five men all supposed to be close to Prasad: Rambachan Singh, 'commander' of the Bramharsi Sena (a private 'army' of Bhumihar landlords), Dilkeshwar Singh, Chandrika Singh, and Shanker Singh and Dinesh Singh, supposed to be Prasad's bodyguards. Further, says the CPI, two days before the massacre, Jagdish Sharma, Congress (I) MLA from Ghosi and a follower of Prasad, had met with other followers of Prasad at a feast at the house of Surendra Singh, Sharma's brother-in-law, where the mass murder plan was subsequently drawn up.

But Prasad says of the five named he knows only Dinesh Singh and Shanker Singh who are not his bodyguards but Congress(I) workers. He alleges that their names were added as an afterthought in the FIR which, curiously enough, was filed the next day even though the Ghosi police station is barely 4 km away. As for the meeting, both Prasad and Surendra Singh point out that Sharma was then in Delhi, along with many other state MLA's who had stayed on after the AICC(I) session.

The CPI's sense of outrage was understandable. Modanganj (population: approximately 3,000) is considered the strongest CPI base in the state with almost the entire population, comprising marginal farmers or landless labourers, being CPI sympathisers. All five killed were hard core party workers. Jagdish Prasad was the mukhiya of Modanganj panchayat and secretary of the Ghosi Anchal CPI; Ramswaroop Prasad and Chandrika Prasad were the secretary and assistant secretary, of the Modanganj unit, while Chhote Sau and Brajnandan were active members of the local unit.

The CPI and the Congress have long been rivals in the area. Jehanabad constituency had seen the bloodiest violence in Bihar during the Lok Sabha elections; officially 12 were killed but unofficial estimates had put the figure at thrice the number. In the assembly elections two months later, eight people were killed in the Ghosi constituency alone. Pramod Kumar, member of the Gaya district council of the CPI, alleged that when Prasad and Sharma had launched their campaign their supporters had vowed to "play Holi with the communists' blood". Prasad of course, denies the charge.

The caste factor adds to the tension. All the major caste groups in the area have their own private armies. Jehanabad subdivision, under which Modanganj comes, has been the battlefield for an ongoing war between IPF extremists, mostly Harijans, the Bhumi Sena of landlords of the backward castes (like the Yadavs) and the Bramharsi Sena of the Bhumihars. Over 250 people have already been killed in the three-cornered war. Shifting political alignments confound matters. The IPF had supported the CPI in the Lok Sabha poll but contested the assembly polls against their erstwhile allies. Prasad and his men say the fall-out is another reason for the IPF-CPI rivalry.

K.M. KISHAN

CPI leaders consoling a bereaved family

Undeniably, however, it was Prasad's alleged involvement which drew attention to the killing. Local people, CPI leaders and even some newspapers have painted Prasad in lurid terms: born into a family of landless labourers, he is said to have started his political career in the CPI(M) by organising the landless against big landowners from his caste. The latter retaliated by poisoning to death seven members of his family. Prasad, who survived, then disappeared and reappeared two years later with wads of currency notes which he distributed to the poor and earned the sobriquet he carries. He is supposed to have made his money in a pharmaceutical company but his detractors say the real source was Nepal, from where smuggling into Bihar is rampant.

According to Prasad, the reality is dramatically different. Born into a family owning about 50 bighas of land, he went to Patna to do his higher studies where he admits he was attracted to the Left, but not so much as to join any communist party. He admits the poison story but claims this was the result of an intra-family dispute. He never disappeared, he says, but merely spent more time in Delhi and Aurangabad where he and his friends started a small pharmaceutical company 18 years ago. He had put Rs 50,000 in it (from his family wealth) and this sum had now grown to maintain him in some luxury and allow him to indulge in his hobby of gardening (his garden routinely wins prizes in Delhi). A long-time Congressman, he came close to Mrs Gandhi when he stood by her in the Janata days. He was rewarded for his loyalty with a ticket in 1980 from Jehanabad. He won then and would have won again this time had, he says, party elements not sabotaged his campaign. "I have nothing against the CPI," he says, "my enemies are within the Congress (I)."

For his part, Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey, who cancelled a trip to Delhi after the massacre, has vowed that the killers will not be spared. "My first priority is to free Bihar from the grip of criminals, political gangsters and mafia leaders and I am ready to pay any price for this," he told INDIA TODAY.

Among those who will be happy if Dubey carries out his pledge will be Munna Goswami, a 12-year-old boy who got hit by bullets when his curiosity drew him to the tea stall in Modanganj where the murders occurred. Also hit was Poonam Kumar, a four-year-old girl. Poonam was discharged after four days in the hospital but Munna was still fighting for his life. The families of the deceased were given Rs 5,000 each by Dubey but for Munna the only hope lies in Dubey's promise to be ruthless in exterminating lawlessness.

Cornering Contractors

CORRUPTION is so firmly rooted in the Indian system that any attempt to check it appears unreal. When Bihar Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey decided last fortnight to speed up developmental activities in the state by pledging to do away with the corrupt system of private contracts, not only was there cynicism, the move was greeted by protests from within and outside his party. Yet Dubey decreed that all big projects, especially in the power and irrigation sectors which account for over 60 per cent of the plan allocations, would henceforth be executed through the public sector Hindustan Steelworks Construction Ltd (HSCL) and the Bihar Construction Corporation (BCC). Realising that the sudden change in government policy would be resisted strongly by the contractors who are a powerful factor in the state's politics, Dubey said: "I am aware of its political implications but I am here to do this and I mean what I say."

To prove that it was not mere rhetoric, the chief minister immediately called a high level meeting of ministers of all concerned departments, the chief secretary, finance secretary, chairman of the state electricity board, irrigation commissioner and HSCL Chairman Major-General S.S. Ahluwalia to discuss the issue. A subcommittee comprising the state electricity board chairman, HSCL chairman and irrigation commissioner worked out the details and rates for awarding contracts to HSCL.

Dubey admitted candidly that he was moving to break the money power and political muscle of the contractors who, he alleged, were holding the state to ransom. He said that all the major irrigation and power projects like Kosi, Gandak, Bagmati, Subernrekha, which have been dragging on for the past 20 to 25 years, eating into public money because project costs had increased four to five times would now be executed under a time-bound programme. According to official sources, HSCL would get construction contracts worth Rs 80 crore a year, so that it could retain its large work force of 13,000 Biharis. Based in Bokaro, HSCL had earlier decided to move out of Bihar as it had not received any contracts since the completion on schedule of the Bokaro steel plant assignment.

Dubey admits that he is trying to break the money power and political muscle of the contractors who, he alleges, are holding the state to ransom.

K.M. KISHAN

Dam site in Palamau district: stalled project

The chief minister also asked the BCC, a state undertaking starved of contracts which had been created by Jagannath Misra in 1974 when he was irrigation minister to check the private contract system, to accept contracts worth Rs 40 crore annually, as much as the unit is equipped to undertake.

In Bihar contractors with known criminal backgrounds and politicians, including some ministers, have been directly or indirectly through their relatives monopolising public contracts. Though most remain far behind schedule or incomplete, no one has been questioned or asked to explain. The Durgawati reservoir project is a case in point. Launched in 1976 at an estimated cost of Rs 30 crore it had been slated to be ready by 1980. The cost now has escalated to Rs 110 crore and though the state Government has spent about Rs 20 crore, the project is yet to take off. So influential is this lobby that even though in August 1978, the irrigation minister Sachidanand Singh startled the Assembly by suggesting that it was worth probing how much of the Rs 129 crore spent on flood protection works had been pocketed by engineers, contractors, and rajnetas, no definite action was actually ever taken.

Instances abound of contracts having been bagged at gunpoint. According to some members of the Bihar Engineering Service Association (BESA) criminals-turned-contractors terrorise engineers to pass their bogus bills. The BESA feels that the Dubey Government cannot free the state from the mafia-contractors control because the problems are so deep-rooted. "A criminal of today is a contractor of tomorrow who becomes a politician the day after," Janki Sharan Prasad, BESA's general secretary, said. Prasad claimed that in the last two years over 50 engineers had been threatened and terrorised by the gun-toting contractors and the Government had remained apathetic. "Engineers are so terrified that they do not want to be posted to the works side in the department concerned," Prasad added.

Records maintained by the state Government paint a similar frightening picture. In 1983, criminal cases were filed against 150 contractors and 83 others were "blacklisted", 158 engineers were suspended and criminal cases filed against 131 officials. Besides this, departmental enquiries were ordered against 178 engineers and officials and 83 of them were "punished". BESA officials allege that while the contractors got away because of their powerful political links, the engineers and officials were conveniently made the scapegoats.

If you think you know which is the fastest-growing two-wheeler company in India, you're probably wrong.

It's Kinetic.

Kinetic Engineering Limited.
The Luna and Spark people.
Over the last ten years, our vehicle production has grown at an annual average rate of 31.54%.
Last year we rolled out 1,56,720 two-wheelers.
Variations of the famous Luna-TFR Plus and Double Plus, and the Spark.
In the 50cc two-wheeler category, we are undoubtedly the largest-selling brand.
In fact, this morning nearly 6,15,000 Indians are happily shuttling around on their favourite models.
Instead of cruising on our achievements, we have shifted gears to be the leaders in the competitive two-wheeler market.
Soon, Kinetic will be launching a new range of two-wheelers. Suited to our conditions and built especially for us Indians.
So now that you have a choice of two-wheelers, remember the big name in the business.

The Government in the Sixth Five-Year Plan spent Rs 711.69 crore on major and medium irrigation projects. But only 4.27 lakh hectares of land was irrigated. Likewise though over Rs 491.82 crore had been spent on the power sector none of the ongoing projects could be commissioned. Former chief minister Chandrashekhar Singh admitted in the Assembly that though 35 projects had been marked for completion by the end of 1983-84, only five were actually completed.

The most recent example of official disinterest was when the Kosi embankment breached last September despite prior warning. Enquires revealed that two days before the disaster the contractor, related to certain politicians, received the last payment of Rs 50 lakh for repairs supposed to have been done. The state Government is now spending Rs 10 crore to repair the embankment.

Dubey's attempt to check the practice of private contracts can only be a positive step. But his detractors feel that he is merely trying to bolster his sagging credibility. They claim that contractors have secured a bridge toll collection contract in Aurangabad for Rs 37 lakh against last year's contract for Rs 55 lakh. Similarly, contracts at much lower rates have been given for Telmarcha bridge, Dobhi, Bhorran and Tundi bridges. A spokesman in the chief minister's secretariat said in defence that these contracts had been finalised when the new ministry was being formed and the decision to end the private contract system would be applicable in big contracts only. Despite the brickbats, if Dubey can rein in corruption to some extent, even that would be sufficient reason for hope in Bihar.

KERALA

Power Tussle

THE RULING United Democratic Front (UDF) in Kerala celebrated its third birthday on May 24 with much rejoicing but the celebrations were marred by yet another crisis in the fractious front. The crisis in the originally four-member National Democratic Party (NDP) over the refusal to resign of Health Minister Ramachandran Nair, which had been simmering for several months, finally came to a head. Bowing to the wishes of the other three MLA's of the NDP who have been vehemently demanding Nair's resignation, Karunakaran finally asked the minister to quit his post. But it was unlikely that the chief minister's decision would do anything but bring about a temporary truce.

For one, Nair delayed his resignation, maintaining that he would resign only if the NDP's parent organisation, the Nair Service Society (NSS), asked him to. And the NSS was clearly not very keen to do that. Said Upendranath Kurup, chairman of the NDP and strongman of the NSS: "The chief minister should not listen to these MLA's who have been expelled from the party." The real reason for the stonewalling, political observers maintained, was that Nair and Kurup wanted to compel Karunakaran to dismiss the minister so that they Officially Nair maintains that he would resign only if the NDPs parent organisation, the Nair Service Society asked him to.

would get the sympathy of the state's 52-lakh-strong Nair community. Said Pandalam Sudhakaran, Congress(I) MLA: "Karunakaran was caught between the devil and the deep sea."

Karunakaran had managed to bring about a temporary truce during the last Assembly session in April when he was facing a no-confidence motion by asking Nair to go on "sick leave" and taking over the health portfolio himself. After the session he reluctantly returned the portfolio. But it was a futile exercise as the dissidents once again protested and threatened to quit the front. It was a threat Karunakaran could not afford to ignore because of his wafer-thin majority (10 in a house of 140). He then got the steering committee of the UDF to ask for Nair's resignation.

The tussle in the NDP was for nothing more than the loaves of office. Explained dissident NDP MLA Therambil Ramakrishnan: "When Nair became health minister (in September 1983) there was an understanding he would step down after a year so others also would have a chance to be ministers, but today he refuses to quit." Ramakrishnan and the other two dissident MLA's, K.G.R. Kartha and Ramachandran Pillai, also allege that Nair has been ineffective and corrupt. Said Ramakrishnan: "Nair was a weak minister who was manipulated by others and couldn't do anything for the Nair community." But the dissidents themselves are vulnerable: Kartha, who was the NDP's first nominee to the ministry, was forced to step down in 1983 after corruption charges had been levelled against him. A.C. Shanmughadas, the firebrand Congress(S) MLA, summed it neatly: "Two NDP MLA's have already been ministers and proved corrupt. The other two also want to be ministers before this ministry's term ends."

The NDP, which claims to speak for the Nairs, has long been a source of worry for Karunakaran though ironically he himself is a Nair. Initially the threat to him was posed by the charismatic and powerful Kidangoor Gopalakrishna Pillai, ex-chairman of the NDP. Mrs Gandhi helped Karunakaran by packing Pillai off to Singapore as the Indian high commissioner there. But Pillai's departure only made matters worse: faction fighting erupted and the NDP split with Nair, Kartha and Ramachandran Pillai ranged against Therambil Ramakrishnan. Now the tables have turned: Kartha, Pillai and Ramakrishnan are gunning for Nair.

The NSS was set up to look into the real and imagined grievances of the once powerful Nairs; among their many demands is reservations for themselves. But because of their infighting the NSS and NDP have been losing their clout.

Karunakaran is still confident his ministry would last the full five-year term but few share his optimism. Says former chief minister and opposition leader E.K. Nayanar: "The NDP and other small communal parties are monsters created by the Congress(I), which will ultimately swallow them." A more ominous sign for the ruling front was CPI(M) General Secretary E.M.S. Namboodripad's call for a "realignment of parties in Kerala based on policies". Such a step could spell doom for the present ministry. With his recurring problems, the icing on Karunakaran's birthday cake was understandably not as sweet as it could have been.

If you think you know how long it took Kinetic to become a leader in the two-wheeler business, wrong once more.

Only three years.

That's all it took to make Luna the number one brand in the 50cc moped market.
And Kinetic the fastest-growing company in the two-wheeler business.
Over the years, we have put over 6,15,000 two-wheelers on the road.
Increased our turnover by over 85% per annum; share value by over 2500% on the stock exchange.
Our product too has undergone constant improvement.
The Luna developed into the Luna TFR Plus and the Luna Double Plus. And we launched the Spark, the first of a new range of city vehicles from Kinetic.

Waiting for a meal: last supper

ANDHRA PRADESH

The Food Fiasco

SOON AFTER N.T. Rama Rao first became chief minister of Andhra Pradesh in January 1983, the hurriedly published official wall calendar for the year, which was widely distributed and displayed, had featured a photograph of children sitting in neat little rows for a meal. The Telugu Desam, second to none in publicising its populist programmes, was reiterating its commitment to provide a free midday meal to the state's primary school children.

But midway through the summer vacations last fortnight, NTR's Government had bad news for the state's 35 lakh primary schoolchildren: after a cabinet meeting on May 23 it was announced that the scheme would be scrapped. The official reason trotted out was that legislators had complained that the scheme was serving little purpose as the sarpanches had shown no interest in it. But that was only an excuse to save upto Rs 33 crore a year.

There was yet another of NTR's early commitments on which he had to go back. One of his first acts after coming to power had been to lower the retirement age of government employees from 58 to 55. In his one-month spell in power, N. Bhaskara Rao had reinstated the higher limit but the 4,500 employees who had already been retired had gone to the Supreme Court. Last fortnight the Supreme Court ordered their reinstatement and the Government began adjusting them into the layers of bureaucracy.

But undoubtedly the move that would hurt NTR more was the termination of the midday meal. The scheme was doomed from the start. Borrowing the idea from the flourishing programme in nearby Tamil Nadu, the Telugu Desam had included it in its election manifesto. But the Congress(I) preempted the Telugu Desam's plans with its chief minister K. Vijayabhaskara Reddy launching the programme in November 1982, about 7 weeks before the assembly elections. A dismayed NTR responded with the charge that the Congress(I) had borrowed the idea only for use as an election gimmick and declared in his manifesto that the Telugu Desam would evolve a "scientific system to implement the midday meal scheme quite effectively and also successfully".

> The move that would hurt NTR most was the termination of the midday meal. The scheme was doomed from the start.

Changes there were but they were neither scientific nor efficient. Teachers were divested of supervisory charge and kitchen management was handed over to village sarpanches, even as some sarpanches of the Krishna and Godavari districts argued that children of farm labourers and other rural poor got better meals at home. And when Rama Rao introduced another change—restricting the free meal scheme to children from backward classes, Harijan and tribal communities—the move only served to heighten class differences, with some sarpanches refusing to manage the kitchen for children hailing from the so-called lower classes.

The snafus were rarely tackled. Only a feeble attempt was made to introduce a health card system to assess the nutritional status and physical progress of primary school students. Admitted the State Labour and Employment Minister P. Indra Reddy: "The only ones who put on fat by the midday meal programme were the sarpanches and this is why some legislators urged the chief minister to wind up the scheme."

Neither NTR, who has visited Madras more often than any other place after becoming chief minister, nor officials managing the programme, made any attempt to learn from the Tamil Nadu experience which has progressed from providing meals to providing toothpowder and now textbooks for the coming academic year. Funds have never been a constraint in Tamil Nadu, with large sums donated by industrialists.

This is not the first of NTR's schemes to have met with dusty death. A plan to reorganise various state-owned corporations and ban private practice by government doctors backfired, and the Government has remained silent on the implementation of an order reserving 30 per cent of jobs in government and government-funded organisations for women. But the reversal of its stand on retirement age has been its other major pullback. Less than a month after he took over as chief minister, NTR by lowering the retirement age, had cut short the working life of 21,548 government employees. The sudden announcement had claimed the lives of 11 people, including that of a senior doctor in the directorate of medical services. Now, following a Supreme Court directive, 4,500 people, whose posts were either lying vacant or had been temporarily filled, are being reinstated.

But the major casualty last fortnight

If you think you know what inspired Kinetic to design India's most popular two-wheeler, you're wrong again.

It was the length of your arm.
And your wife's sari.

The arm length of an average Indian differs from others. A fact we considered when designing a vehicle with the right distance from seat to handlebar. And because most Indian women wear saris, they need a lower chassis frame, to get on easily. Ample proof that we do not merely copy a foreign product, but create, design and develop vehicles to suit Indian conditions. And constantly improve our products to give you maximum reliability, lowest maintenance cost and highest resale value.

It's this kind of innovative spirit that has helped Kinetic become the fastest-growing company in the two-wheeler business.

Soon, Kinetic will be launching a new range of two-wheelers. Suited to our conditions and built especially for us Indians.

was the midday meal scheme. Although the programme was listed as a second priority item, after drinking water for villages, in the Pragati Padham—the 15-point economic and development programme of the Telugu Desam—an official of the state education department was forced to confess that "if there was a watch-dog panel, the children would have got the meal. All that we can boast of after spending Rs 85 crore is creating huge 'assets' in kitchen vessels." It was quite clearly, a case of empty vessels making an awful racket.

N.T. RAMA RAO

Costly Ride

BACK in the 1950s, when Andhra Pradesh Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao was just another film hero living in Madras he used to drive around in a modest Morris Minor. Rama Rao's fortunes have seen a sea change since then and possibly nothing symbolises this better than his stable of cars: a red Maruti (which he owns personally), a white air-conditioned Maruti and a Contessa (both bought by the Government). And now orders have gone out for the purchase of the costliest car made in India: the air-conditioned Standard Rover 2000, slated to cost Rs 1.9 lakh.

On becoming chief minister in January 1983, Rama Rao had spurned the use of the air-conditioned Mercedes that Congress(I) chief ministers before him had been using and opted for an Ambassador, for reasons of economy. Later that year the first Marutis rolled out of the Gurgaon factories and Rama Rao was one of the select VIP's given the car out of turn. It remained unused for more than a year: the Contessa and the Maruti deluxe took over from the Ambassador. But when the price of petrol was increased by a steep 97 paise per litre in March this year, NTR dramatically announced that he would henceforth use only his personal Maruti. He explained: "The thought of saving a pie is commendable. We have no proper roads, no bridges and no funds to complete our projects. As a representative of the people and a public servant it is my duty to effect as much economy as possible."

The car was used, but only for a few days. It was soon evident that the film star-turned-politician, was only preparing the ground for greater melodrama to protest against the petrol price hike. He had an auto-rickshaw positioned between the pilot and the escort police cars outside his home in the centrally-located Abid's, ready to drive to the Assembly. He was advised against using the auto-rickshaw for security reasons though the need for using two police vehicles was never questioned.

NTR with his Maruti (top) and Contessa: flaunting austerity

NTR's aides explain the new purchase by pointing out that he logs at least 75 km every day. NTR stays in his ashram home, Shanti Kutir, which fringes the Osmansagar about 25 km from the city. His daily round from home to office and back includes a detour to his home in Abid's where his family stays. The decision to go in for a Rover 2000 was explained as necessary not only to rest the chief minister, who has a heart problem, but also to provide him "tighter security". But coming as it did in the same fortnight that the Government discontinued the midday meal for schoolchildren, the Government's extravagance raised not a few eyebrows. And besides, as his detractors asked, does a chief minister who claims to head a "people's government" need such tight security?

NTR speaks repeatedly about paisa-pinching as the state runs up huge overdrafts in implementing his populist programmes but examples of his personal extravagance abound. Last year the Government spent Rs 4.5 lakh on a bus that would be somewhat similar to the Chaitanya Ratham. NTR was to use the vehicle on his tour of the districts but he changed his mind later.

Quite clearly, NTR, who still wears saffron and calls himself a sanyasi, knows little about austerity. When journalists were invited to his "ashram" after speculation about the chief minister's nocturnal activities surfaced as a consequence of a bar on visitors, one journalist pointed out that considering the wall-to-wall carpeting and the air-conditioners it was a misnomer to call the plush two-bedroom house an "ashram". Unfazed, NTR retorted: "All this is a matter of taste. This is my taste." Last fortnight it was again evident that NTR's well-known propensity to practise austerity was driving him to always be among the first to buy the latest in the new genre of made-in-India cars. It is, after all as NTR himself put it quite succintly, just a matter of taste.

If you think you know where Kinetic will go in the competitive two-wheeler market, congratulations, you're right!

Up!

That's the way we look at it.
And we'll do it not just by selling more two-wheelers and making profits, but by working the way we have been doing for the past twelve years.
Innovating.
Kinetic have always believed Indian customers deserve the best.
And that's just what we're geared to deliver.
In succession to the Luna range and the unique Spark, Kinetic is manufacturing a whole range of two-wheelers especially suited to Indian conditions and the Indian rider.
A range worth looking forward to.
So now that you have a choice of two-wheelers, remember the big name in the business.

PATHIK DEV MALIK

Election committee meeting: intrigue

WEST BENGAL

Civic Discontent

THE RECENTLY overhauled West Bengal unit of the Congress(I), like the ill-fated Titanic, seems destined to flounder on its first voyage. The state Congress(I) boat, headed for the June 30 Calcutta municipal elections, sprang a leak last fortnight with violent discontent erupting in its lower ranks, senior leaders spewing angry denunciations and a skipper hard put to steer a straight course through the shoals.

The jarring began from the very first day (May 10) that party candidates began filing their nominations. That day a rebellious group of partymen ransacked the PCC(I) headquarters to express their displeasure at the choice of a candidate. But the real bombshell exploded a couple of days later with the disclosure of an angry letter written to PCC(I) chief Pranab Mukherjee by Union Law Minister Asoke Sen. Mysteriously leaked out to the local press, the letter expressed displeasure over the fact that a large number of anti-socials had been included in the Congress(I) list. Sen wrote that since the candidates for the municipal wards falling within his Calcutta north-west constituency had been chosen without his approval, he wished to disassociate himself from the municipal election committee.

Stung by the letter, the first to react was the volatile youth leader Subrata Mukherjee, who countered that two of Sen's nominees—Jaan Mohammed and Ruhul Kader—were also known to have bad reputations. Sen, charged Mukherjee, had violated party discipline and dealt the party image a grievous blow. Open diatribes ceased thereafter but privately virtually every leader was reeling off names of alleged anti-socials in the Congress(I) list, while swearing that the nominees in his own camp were of spotless reputation.

In an obvious attempt to restore peace, both Pranab Mukherjee and Asoke Sen were summoned by the high command. But by the time they returned and issued public statements stoutly denying that any of their party candidates could be considered anti-socials, the damage had already been done. Nothing could shake off the impression that the party's powerful underworld connections in the city had resurfaced after years.

Sen, for one, came back a changed man. "I have always been against anti-socials dabbling in public life," he said, and added, "but this does not mean that I have spoken specifically against anyone or that I am implying that our party list is full of anti-socials." He, however, refused to specify whether he had mentioned these points in his letter to Pranab Mukherjee, dismissing the topic with, "It's an internal matter." And perhaps it would have remained so, had local MLA's and MP's been allowed a greater say as originally planned, in selecting the candidates.

"Everything went wrong when the state Government suddenly decided to bring forward the last date for filing nominations from May 15 to May 11," explained Ajit Panja, the convenor of the municipal poll election committee. Panja was initially going about the business of selecting candidates in a fair and systematic manner: receiving bio-datas, recommendations of different MLA's and MP's and scrutinising each application. But the last minute announcement caught him unawares and eventually four working groups were formed, each responsible for choosing candidates from the four city districts—north, central, south and Burrabazar.

"These working groups, as it turned out, were dominated by the Subrata Mukherjee-Somen Mitra combine and its supporters like Mamata Banerjee," charged former Union minister Saugata Ray. The genesis of the controversy was contained in the list prepared by the Burrabazar working group, comprising Subrata Mukherjee, Deoki Nandan Poddar, Rajesh Khaitan and Priya Ranjan Das Munshi. Instead of first getting the list approved by Asoke Sen, MP of the area, it was directly submitted for filing. "Nobody got the list cleared by me," says Sen emphatically.

According to one member of the Burrabazar group, Das Munshi had been given the responsibility of getting the list cleared by Sen, but he had deliberately omitted to do so, and hence precipitated the controversy. "This is absolute nonsense," counters Das Munshi. "The list had been compiled by three MLA's who said they had already taken Sen's consent."

The Burrabazar list provoked a total revolt with most of the district Congress(I) committee members, including its outgoing president K.L. Verma, submitting their resignations and alleging that many of the official nominees had disreputable pasts. For instance, S. Bhimsaria, ward 43, was accused of having links with Sikh extremists and Vijay Upadhyay, ward 22, of being an anti-social. Refuting the allegations, an indignant Rajesh Khaitan remarked: "It just shows to what lengths people will go to discredit their competitors."

Worse still, all over the city's 141 wards, disgruntled Congressmen filed nominations as independents. "There are at least 50 rebels in the fray includ-

Introducing the car that's improved all the way through.

You saw. You liked. But you know sometimes that's all there is to it. And you wish changes for the better didn't stop with the cosmetic. The Premier 118 NE ushers in a new era of change.

It's got Nissan power inside it!

The modern, 4-cylinder 1.18 litre Nissan engine ensures a powerful pick-up and high fuel efficiency — upto 17 kms. per litre (according to the Government of India test procedures). All four forward gears have a synchromesh system.

Fade-resistant disc brakes on the front wheels. A strong independent front suspension. Easy steering and manoeuvring. Good road holding capacity. Adequate ground clearance. They all add up to a safer, smoother ride.

It's got more!

A special anti-corrosion treatment on the undercarriage makes it rust-resistant. In addition, the sound deadener and thermal padding reduce heat, vibration and noise levels inside the car. The Premier 118 NE. It suddenly makes driving a new experience.

From Premier Automobiles — of course!

The Premier 118 NE combines the sturdy body of the Fiat 124 and a modern, fuel-efficient 1.18 litre engine designed in collaboration with Nissan. PAL engineers have tested and perfected the model to suit Indian climates and road conditions.

After all, we've always given you the better car. Now, with new horizons opening up on the car scene, isn't it natural the better choice should come from us?

ing an ex-deputy mayor and a couple of veteran councillors," a Congress(I) leader revealed. Not for the first time, the state Congress(I) leadership reacted too late calling for rebels to withdraw well after the last date. Said Pranab Mukherjee: "Now we have appealed to rebel candidates to write official letters stating that they are withdrawing from their candidatures and will campaign for the official candidates." The rebels were also threatened with suspension from the party for a period of six years if they failed to withdraw. But withdrawals were few and far between.

Pranab Mukherjee explains the unseemly upheavals within the party as a somewhat inevitable consequence of it being "mass-based rather than a closely-knit party". All the same, as Das Munshi points out, the Congress(I)'s chances of success in the municipal polls will depend on "our mobilisation of the rank and file and handling of local egos and personalities". Although Das Munshi and Mukherjee now say all leaders will campaign in unison and ensure that all rebel candidates will step down, the impression that the state Congress(I) is a rag tag bunch united temporarily for winning the elections is unlikely to be dispelled.

The Left Front in comparison has emerged the better, even though some of its own candidates are not without blemish. By deliberately maintaining a long gap of one-and-a-half months between the last date for filing nominations and the elections, the Marxists seem to have ensured that personalities rather than issues come to the fore. Besides, the Left Front has assumed more credibility after INTUC chief Subrata Mukherjee's declaration that the INTUC would jointly participate with left trade unions in resisting lock-outs and closures. This, coupled with Asoke Sen's recent comment at a public function that "Calcutta is not dying", implied that it is the leftists and not the unsympathetic Centre that has the good of the state and the city at heart.

The state Congress(I) had been unable to come out with an election manifesto before the campaign officially kicked off on May 25. The party has now decided to publish a book detailing the backgrounds of its candidates. Pranab Mukherjee has been reiterating that "not a single person among 141 Congress(I) candidates is undesirable," but the Congress(I) boat seemed dangerously close to capsizing. —INDRANIL BANERJIE

RAMAKRISHNA HEGDE

Time Out

HE HAD wistfully spoken about it several times in the past. When his party unexpectedly triumphed in the assembly elections in March, a part of him was sorry that he wouldn't be able to take a vacation. But for a glorious 15 days last fortnight, Karnataka Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde luxuriated in the freedom of being a private citizen. The 58-year-old charismatic politician ensconced himself in the Tamil Nadu Government-owned Kohinoor Palace in the still beautiful hill station of Kodaikanal, accompanied by three members of his immediate family and a startlingly small retinue of two officials. "It is very necessary for a man who really works to unbend for some time," explained Hegde.

Back home his Government was making news by abolishing capitation fees in all educational institutions but Hegde had carried no responsibilities with him. What he did not forget, however, were his golf-clubs. Sporting a cane-woven cap, informal denims and canvas shoes, Hegde looked every inch the chief executive of a multinational corporation as he intently teed and putted away. Hegde is not new to golf; he first played it in the '60s when his doctor suggested it as a cure for hyperacidity. But he has not played the game with the passion he showed at Kodaikanal. He was at the course at 7 a.m. and he left it only around three-and-a-half hours later after having played all the 18 holes and walking over 12 km.

But, of course, it wasn't a totally carefree vacation for Hegde who has been bothered by a persisting throat ailment for the last two years. Even speaking for a short time would irritate his vocal chords and he would often lose his voice. Last September doctors in Boston diagnosed nothing wrong with his chords and advised speech therapy as the only cure.

Explained Dr N.P. Nataraja, head of the department of speech sciences at the All-India Institute of Speech and Therapy in Mysore who attended on Hegde: "We found that his basic problem was that he was not speaking at the optimum pitch and he was unnecessarily tensing the muscles of the neck and larynx. So I trained the chief minister (for one and a half hours every day) to speak loudly but without raising his pitch above the optimum level." Nataraja started off by using a computerised pitch analyser; Hegde would speak into a microphone, the pitch analyser would record the pitch and intensity of his voice on a screen and Hegde could see what he was doing wrong. But soon the computer became unnecessary as Hegde developed an ear for the pitch and intensity and learnt to speak at the right pitch. A visibly happy Hegde told INDIA TODAY: "Now I have learnt to speak loudly without tensing my vocal muscles. I feel much more comfortable in the throat while speaking and there is much less strain."

Not that Hegde was not talking. Even at Kodaikanal he held impromptu press conferences at the golf-course. As Hegde said: "My speech therapist has been telling me that a longer life for my throat means shorter speeches but I tend to speak quite a lot." But after Kodaikanal things had clearly changed. At Madurai, on his way back, when party workers pressed him to address them he indicated by sign language that he was unable to speak. It was explained that Hegde had decided to observe silence on Sundays.

CONFESSIONS OF A TERRORIST

Bhindranwale's hit man Virsa Singh, now in police custody, is a suspect in the murder of Delhi Sikh leader Harbans Singh Manchanda and is believed to be behind scores of bombings and robberies.

EVEN ONE year after the army flushed out Bhindranwale's band of extremists from the Golden Temple complex in Amritsar, the real mechanics of extremism in Punjab have remained a more or less grey area. For every little bit of fact there are many fables and for every claim there are many disclaimers.

But now intelligence agencies claim to have worked the problem out to some extent. They have been studiously poring over the long list of "confessions" made by suspects arrested from the Golden Temple and elsewhere, trying to determine the motivations of the extremists and the strategy employed by them. A key "confession" on this list comes from Virsa Singh Valtoha, who was wanted in connection with numerous incidents of murder, robbery and terrorism. Principal Correspondent RAJU SANTHANAM obtained a copy of the 63-page report of his interrogation and, on its basis, filed this story.

THE WORLD over, soldiers, scribes, scholars and sleuths have tried for decades to fathom the complex chemistry of an extremists' mind. Yet no one has been able to say just what turns a perfectly normal young man into a terrorist or guerrilla, readily willing to sacrifice his life for a usually unattainable cause he does not know much about.

This is also true of the Punjab terrorist. The large number of veterans in the Indian security network scanning the records of hundreds of suspected Sikh extremists, arrested, dead or at large have yet to come up with a credible answer to that question. But they lay great store by the long list of "confessions" they have collected over the months, and one of these is attributed to Virsa Singh Valtoha.

At 23, Virsa Singh, considered to be one of Bhindranwale's main hit men and blamed for the murder of Delhi Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee leader Harbans Singh Manchanda, besides scores of bombings and robberies, is a typical representative of the Bhindranwale band. One of the six sons of Sohan Singh, a small-time farmer from Valtoha village in Amritsar district bordering Pakistan, he comes from the very heart of the Amritsar-Gurdaspur-Tarn Taran-Patti belt from where Bhindranwale got the bulk of his recruits. He was arrested by the army from the Golden Temple complex during Operation Bluestar last June.

More than that, he had the kind of upbringing that, curiously, went into the mental make-up of a lot of Bhindranwale men. After passing his higher secondary examination in the first division, he was trained as a granthi in Gurudwara Baba Budha Bir Sahib in Amritsar. But he soon strayed from the spiritual path. In the B.A. first year examination, which he took in 1981, he could not pass in English and then failed in the supplementary examination in September that year. Frustrated, he joined the Communist Party of India (Marxist)'s Students Federation of India. But, as the Bhindranwale wave began to sweep the Punjab countryside, he shifted allegiance to the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF).

Very soon he came in contact with Kewal Singh, a cousin of AISSF President Amrik Singh who took him to the Golden Temple. Meanwhile he failed yet again to clear his English examination. What followed was almost pre-ordained. As Virsa Singh told his interrogators: "Since I had spare time, I started visiting the AISSF office in the Golden Temple and began to work voluntarily there."

It was during this period that he had his baptism in terrorism. In November, 1982, he says, AISSF general secretary Harminder Singh Sandhu asked him to join a group of youngsters in throwing bombs at the house of Punjab education minister Harcharan Singh Ajnala. He did and told his interlocutors: "Around 8 p.m. Harminder Singh Sandhu and Rajinder Singh Mehta gave us two hand-grenades from Akal Rest House. These were kept under bananas in a paper bag. Anokh Singh and I carried this bag in hand.... We found a newly-built house close to Ajnala's. Anokh Singh and I took off our shoes and trousers. While I held Anokh Singh's shoes and trousers and stayed at a distance he threw the two grenades at Ajnala's house. Both of us ran from there for about half a kilometre and crossed a canal." On returning to Amritsar, "We met Harminder Singh Sandhu and Rajinder Singh Mehta in Akal Rest House. I exchanged my clothes with those of Harminder Singh Sandhu and went to attend my college."

Once he had proved his worth in the raid he became a regular participant in Bhindranwale hit squads. But the turning point in his life came with the bomb explosions at Palika Bazar in Delhi on March 5, 1983. Virsa Singh had actively participated in the raid. Soon enough, Harminder Singh Sandhu told him that a case had been registered against him in Delhi. This was a lie but good enough to unnerve Virsa Singh. Says he: "I did not find my name mentioned in the news reports of these explosions. I, however, began to live in the Golden Temple complex for fear of arrest." That completed his transition from an ordinary college student into a confirmed fugitive hiding from the law. In July 1983 he started living in room No. 20, Guru Ram Das Serai. Three months later he was formally appointed AISSF office secretary.

He soon became a confidant of Sandhu and others in the AISSF hierarchy. Besides, being the office secretary he was also privy to practically everything that happened within the organisation. Presuming that the details of his interrogation have been recorded honestly by investigating police officers, he seems to have a good memory and accurately recalls major turning points in the three-year history of extremism in Punjab, besides actions in which he himself participated. Here are some examples, quoted directly from the interrogation report, marked "top secret":

Murder of H.S. Manchanda: "The AISSF was banned on 19.3.84. Harbans Singh Manchanda, president of the Delhi Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee (DGPC) issued press statements welcoming this and also asking Sant Bhindranwale to vacate the Akal Takht....Harminder Singh Sandhu asked Amarjeet Singh Chawla, chief organising secretary, AISSF, and me to keep in readiness for this work.

"After a day or two Harminder Singh Sandhu and Rajinder Singh Mehta took Chawla, one Gurinder Singh Bhola and me to a room in Guru Ram Das Serai. I had one .455 bore revolver and 19 bullets. Bhola had one .30 bore pistol given to him by Sandhu. It was suggested that Bhola and Chawla should steal a vehicle for this action in Delhi ....Chawla drove the car. We reached the residence of Manchanda (in Delhi) around 8 a.m. We saw Manchanda returning to his home and then coming out in a car. We chased the car. Five or six persons were sitting in Manchanda's car-....Chawla advised that we should take a chance at the red light where the car will have to stop....When Manchanda's car stopped at the red light near Tilak Bridge, Chawla asked me and Bhola to get down and we did so hurriedly. Both of us ran towards Manchanda's car but the light was already green and Manchanda's car had started. I shouted at Bhola to come back but he did not listen to me. He began firing. He fired 6-7 bullets. Meanwhile I too reached near Manchanda's car. I fired six bullets from the other side. Bhola replaced his empty magazine with a new one and fired more bullets. In all Bhola must have fired about 13-14 bullets. It was about 12 noon. We ran towards our car. Manchanda's bodyguard fired 9-10 bullets but none of these hit us. We got into our car which Chawla kept in starting position. He drove us from near Supreme Court. I was dropped near India Gate and Chawla drove away with Bhola. I caught a three-wheeler and reached Nanaksar Gurudwara.

"On 29.3.84 we caught a 9 a.m. train from Delhi and reached Amritsar around 7 p.m. Sandhu and Mehta took us to Bhai Amrik Singh who, in turn, led us to Sant Bhindranwale in Akal Takht. There was some crowd. We waited for about an hour for the crowd to thin out. Bhindranwale expressed his happiness on this work and remarked that he had since pardoned me for my earlier mistake (of calling my beloved to the Golden Temple complex)."

On distribution of arms at the Golden Temple complex: "All the AISSF inmates in the Golden Temple Complex carried revolvers/pistols on their person. These were given to them by Sant Bhindranwale. I too had been asking for one since the day I began to stay in Akal Rest House. Sant Bhindranwale did not give me any weapon for quite some time because he was annoyed with me on account of the fact that my beloved (Balwinder Kaur) had called on me in the Golden Temple complex and this had been brought to his notice. Harminder Singh Sandhu, however, succeeded in getting me one .38 revolver and 25 bullets from Sant Bhindranwale around January 1984."

> "All the AISSF inmates in the Golden Temple complex carried revolvers and pistols. These were given to them by Sant Bhindranwale. Later Harminder Singh Sandhu succeeded in getting me a .38 revolver and 25 bullets from Sant Bhindranwale."

On explosions at Palika Bazar and inter-state bus terminus during the Non-Aligned Meet in Delhi: "On the evening of 5.3.83 Harminder Singh Sandhu and Satinderjit Singh Khalsa alias 'PT' told me on the roof of the Akal Rest House that the non-aligned meet was to be held at Delhi and that I had to take some boys to Delhi for throwing bombs and leaflets during that period. On the following day they gave us a bag containing six country made bombs and briefed Kamalinder Singh alias Pappu, Santokh Singh Kala, Dharam Singh Dharma (all of Amritsar) and me that we should throw the bombs at Vigyan Bhawan and on Parliament Street ....In Delhi we stayed in a room at Gurudwara Bangla Sahib. On 7.3.83 Sarabjeet Singh Toni of Amritsar and Sarabjeet Singh, general secretary, AISSF, from Jammu joined us with leaflets. We threw these in Gurudwara Bangla Sahib and in the letter boxes of many embassies including those of the USA and Saudi Arabia.

"The same evening Toni and Kala took some leaflets and one bomb to Palika Bazar. Dharma took one bomb and some leaflets to ISBT. Pappu carried one bomb and some leaflets to Sheila cinema. Sarabjeet Singh (of Jammu) and I took one bomb each....We came back to Amritsar and told Sandhu all about what we had done in Delhi."

On murder of Bua Das, Central Interrogation Agency inspector at Gurdaspur: "On a day in February 1983 I stayed in the Akal Rest House with Harminder Singh Sandhu and Rajinder Singh Mehta. Anokh Singh also came there. I learnt that Anokh Singh had gone to kill Bua Das but did not succeed.

"On that night Sandhu, Mehta and Anokh Singh told me that since my village was also in the same area as Ghariala, Bua Das's village I was to join Anokh Singh in killing Bua Das who harassed Sikhs in Gurdaspur and was responsible for breaking the arms and legs of many young Sikhs.

"On the following morning Anokh Singh gave me a .12 bore country made pistol and 12 cartridges. He was carrying a .38 revolver. We caught a bus to Ghariala but were told that Bua Das had gone to immerse his father's ashes in the Ganges. We returned to Amritsar.

"On the day of dashwan (tenth day after death) of Bua Das' father, Anokh Singh and I left for Ghariala village. Around 7 p.m. we saw Bua Das going for a walk with his brother. When they reached near the railway station Anokh Singh fired at Bua Das and his brother. I did not fire....We then reported to Sandhu and Mehta in the Golden Temple. They already knew about it and were very happy. On the same evening Anokh Singh took me to see Sant Bhindranwale. Anokh Singh informed him that I was not able to fire from my pistol. Sant Bhindranwale, who was otherwise in a very happy mood, felt a little annoyed with me."

On the robbing of Syndicate Bank, Amritsar, in February 1984: "On a night during February 1984 Sandhu and Mehta asked Gurinder Singh Bhola, Mathura Singh, Surjeet Singh of Amritsar and me to commit a robbery at the Syndicate Bank, Amritsar. Accordingly, four of us, carrying our revolvers/pistols reached the bank which had earlier been seen by Bhola. We threatened the bank staff with our weapons. Bhola snatched away the gun from the bank guard and dismantled it. The cash at the counter was kept in a bag which was taken away by Surjeet Singh. Bhola and I left on the motorcycle while Mathura Singh and Surjeet Singh carried the bag containing the looted money on the scooter. While they were starting the scooter someone snatched the bag away from them....When we informed Sandhu and Mehta in Akal Rest House about the loss of the looted money they felt sorry about it."

On the plans to kill Darbara Singh in Delhi: "Bhindranwale had been desiring the killing of Darbara Singh for a long time. During May 1984 he directed Dalbir Singh alias Fauji and Amarjeet Singh Chawla to visit Delhi and collect information about the residence and movements of Darbara Singh. Chawla talked to me and sought my consent for accompanying him to Delhi. But a few days later he told me that we were now going to kill Darbara Singh rather than merely collect information. He told me that the other men earmarked for this included Bhola, Bakhshish Singh (clean-shaven) and Sukhdev Singh alias Labh Singh...He asked me if we could associate Harminder Singh Gill in this work.

"Accordingly, probably on 7.5.84 Chawla, Fauji, Gill and I met Bhindranwale who offered to give us arms and money according to our demands for this job. He said that Chawla was the leader of the group and anyone disobeying him would be severely punished....On the morning of 9.5.84 they (Chawla and Fauji) collected money and arms from Bhindranwale and came to room No. 22 of Guru Ram Das Serai....They brought one Sten gun and probably three magazines of its ammunition, two .30 pistols, one .38 revolver and a good number of bullets.

"We met at the pre-fixed time and place....One day Bhola, Chawla, Bakhshish Singh and I went to Anand Niketan but failed to locate the residence of Darbara Singh there. Chawla, however insisted that Darbara Singh stayed in Anand Niketan. We returned to Venus Hotel where we were staying....But later we were told that Bhola and Budh Singh (who had returned to Punjab) had been arrested by the police there and thus Sandhu and Mehta wanted us back in Amritsar. Next morning we left from Delhi separately."

Manchanda's body lies outside the Sisganj Gurudwara

> "He began firing. He fired 6-7 bullets. Meanwhile I too reached Manchanda's car. I fired six bullets from the other side. Bhola replaced his empty magazine with a new one and fired more bullets. In all Bhola must have fired about 13-14 bullets."

On disturbances during the Asiad: "I now recollect that during the days of Asiad 1982, one day I had gone to the Golden Temple where Harminder Singh Sandhu and Rajinder Singh Mehta told me that a programme had since been planned to throw leaflets at the National Stadium, Delhi, during the inaugural ceremony of Asiad. Sandhu gave me the draft of the leaflet and asked me to prepare a good number of these in my hand which I should carry to Delhi and join Kamalinder Singh Pappu, Satbeer Singh and Gurmej Singh (all in Amritsar jail now), Nirmal Singh and Harnam Singh Nama at Gurudwara Bangla Sahib. He also gave me money for wayside expenses.

"Anokh Singh accompanied me. His assignment was different from that of mine. I was also given 10 tickets for the final hockey match to be played between the Indian and Pakistani teams. Accordingly Anokh Singh and I reached Delhi on 29.11.82 and stayed in Gurudwara Bangla Sahib where the aforesaid AISSF workers met us on 30.11.82.

"On the following day I was feeling indisposed and, therefore, gave up the idea of courting arrest. I returned from the stadium with Anokh Singh whereas the remaining five of the aforesaid AISSF workers courted arrest after throwing leaflets and shouting slogans. I courted arrest on 4.12.82 from Bangla Sahib

Gurudwara in the jatha of Parkash Singh Badal.

"Anokh Singh, who had accompanied me to Delhi at the time of Asiad, had the assignment of exploding bombs. But the AISSF workers from whom he was to get these bombs had already courted arrest with the same jatha."

On disturbances on the 1984 Republic Day: "During January 1984, Harminder Singh Sandhu and Balbir Singh Sandhu, secretary-general of the National Council of Khalistan decided that some AISSF workers should be deputed to burn buses, the Indian Constitution and the flag at various places in Amritsar district on the occasion of Republic Day on 26.1.84. It was also decided that the responsibility for this would be owned by the national council of Khalistan.

"Accordingly Harminder Singh Sandhu gave this assignment to two groups of AISSF workers; one consisting of Gurlal Singh, Gurnam Singh and Balwinder Singh and the second consisting of Rachhpal Singh Bhola, Gursewak Singh, Tejinder Singh and Balraj Singh, all of whom were students of Beer Sahib College, Amritsar.... These boys came to the Golden Temple on 25.1.84 and collected one .303 countrymade pistol, one .32 bore countrymade revolver and one hand-grenade along with the Constitution of India and national flag from Rajinder Singh Mehta. They were also given some leaflets in the name of National Council of Khalistan issued by Balbir Singh Sandhu. These AISSF members burnt a roadways bus, the Constitution and the national flag on 26.1.84 at Jhabal. The three boys of the first group were arrested while doing so at Patti.

On the plan to hijack an Indian Airlines aircraft from Srinagar: "One Amarjeet Singh Randhawa, arrested by the army along with us on the night of 5/6 June told me in confidence that Bhai Amrik Singh and Harminder Singh Sandhu deputed him towards the end of May, 1984, for hijacking an Indian Airlines plane from Srinagar but the plan did not materialise. He said that had this plan of hijacking materialised he would have been in a foreign country and not in the custody of the Indian Army on that day. He also told me that Bhai Amrik Singh and Sandhu planned this hijacking in consultation with Sant Bhindranwale.

"Randhawa told me that a certain Avtar Singh Khalsa of Jammu was deputed to arrange for sending arms into the plane to be hijacked. He said that when he along with his companions met Avtar Singh he asked them to come after a few days as he had not yet succeeded in arranging the arms to be smuggled into the plane. He added that they were to go and contact Avtar Singh Khalsa again but for his arrest during the army action. He further said that one Sten-gun, a pistol and Rs 1 lakh (for expenses abroad) had already been given to Avtar Singh Khalsa by Bhai Amrik Singh and Harminder Singh Sandhu. These, in my opinion, could still be lying in his custody."

On burning of 36 railway stations in Punjab: "Bhai Amrik Singh and Harminder Singh Sandhu wanted to pressurise the Government through violence to lift the ban on the AISSF. They conversed with Bhindranwale. A plan for burning a large number of railway stations was also chalked out. After getting the blessings of Bhindranwale they deputed a man of confidence in each district of Punjab to carry out the work. After the burning of a large number of railway stations in Punjab on 14.4.84 these district level leaders of AISSF gathered at Golden Temple, Amritsar.

"I also learnt that this action was well-planned. The date and time for burning railway stations and then holding the meeting in the Golden Temple was pre-fixed. After the action all these leaders held a meeting on the roof of Guru Ram Das Langar which was also attended by Rajinder Singh Mehta, Kewal Singh, Baldev Singh, Amarjit Singh Chawla, Harminder Singh Sandhu, Bhai Amrik Singh, Major-General (Retd) Shahbeg Singh, Major-General (Retd) Jaswant Singh Bhullar and Jathedar Ram Singh. In this meeting Bhai Amrik Singh and Harminder Singh Sandhu thanked the AISSF workers who had successfully carried out the plan."

Virsa Singh is not able to throw much light on the goings on inside the temple complex during Operation Bluestar as he was among the bunch trapped away from the Akal Takht, in the serais. Yet he comes out with the revelation that on June 1, following the heavy exchange of fire between the extremists and the paramilitary forces and troops around the temple Bhindranwale had thought in terms of declaring the formation of Khalistan. In his confession he says: "Kewal Singh (Amrik Singh's cousin) told me on June 2 that Bhindranwale had spoken to Gurcharan Singh Tohra and asked him to announce the formation of Khalistan. But Tohra did not agree."

In strictly legal terms the interrogation report may not be of too much value. But intelligence men assert that they have verified most of the statements to be correct. But their real test, ultimately, will be in the courts for, unless these statements ultimately lead to convictions doubts about their veracity will always prevail.

TERRORIST PLOT

Sinister Designs

FOR ALL the high-level diplomatic rituals acted out between India and the United States in the last several months, it was ultimately the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) that scored the most telling blow for improved relations between the two countries on the eve of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's visit. In a single sweep, the FBI penetrated, busted and arrested members of a US-based extremist Sikh assassination ring which had targeted not only Rajiv Gandhi, but other leading Indian politicians as well. The FBI move not only gave other radical groups with similar intentions notice that they are under continuous surveillance but also helped snuff out some of the much ballyhooed fear in India that an American 'foreign hand' is out to undermine the integrity and stability of the subcontinent.

An INDIA TODAY investigation reveals that while the American 'Sting' operation against the radical Sikh group was a dramatic success in that it led to the capture of the ringleader, Gurpratap Singh Birk, 35, and four co-conspirators, the arrests in New Orleans also blew the cover off a much larger FBI clandestine operation aimed at nabbing at least two dozen Sikh extremists, including Birk, who were shortly to commence a course in guerrilla warfare and explosives training designed to enable them to carry out various assassinations and widespread terrorist bombings throughout India—starting with the planned murder of Rajiv Gandhi during his US visit.

The FBI with the help of the State Department and other US law enforcement agencies had secretly infiltrated this wider conspiracy which agents refer to as the 'Gandhi plot'. The FBI-planned manoeuvre was, however, thrown out of gear with Birk's arrest in New Orleans on charges that he was there to assassinate Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal. The plot was but an offshoot of the wider 'Gandhi plot' and the arrests, made two days before the training camp was scheduled to begin, alarmed other terrorists into flight. "In a way it was unfortunate," said US Chief Attorney Ronald Depetris, who had been monitoring the FBI's operation from New York. "The New Orleans arrests really blew the wider undercover operation. We could have nabbed them all. But then Mr Bhajan Lal's life was in danger. We had no choice." He added that investigations were still in progress.

The arrests of the five Sikh extremists in New Orleans are a grim pointer to the actual threat to Rajiv Gandhi's life. According to intelligence sources small bands of determined and mobilised Sikh extremists are operating as fragmented groups with no apparent central chain of command, but with a well identified purpose. Following the assassination of Mrs Gandhi, the Indian Government alerted US intelligence agencies about their well founded suspicions that some of the financing of militant Sikh activity in India originated from US-based Sikh extremist organisations. President Reagan was reported to be personally concerned about increasing terrorism in India and had privately pledged the cooperation of US law enforcement authorities to combat it. One important tool that was to be used for this purpose was the FBI's crack counter-intelligence and anti-terrorist unit—a specially trained force.

The American 'Sting' operation against the radical Sikh group was a dramatic success but the arrests in New Orleans also blew the cover off a much larger FBI clandestine operation aimed at nabbing at least two dozen Sikh extremists who planned to carry out various assassinations and widespread terrorist bombings throughout India.

Gurpratap Birk, alias 'John Singh,' was hardly the composite of the run of the mill terrorist. Making between $45,000 and $60,000 (Rs 5.6 lakh-7.5 lakh) a year and a resident of Brooklyn, New York, he worked as a software engineer for the Automated Tools Co, an outfit specialising in leasing computerised tool collection equipment. He came to New York about three years ago, after obtaining a doctorate in engineering from London. Birk holds a British passport, and his wife and children still live in London. "He was very well spoken, very knowledgeable," says Fred Rossetti, an executive working with the same firm, who knew Birk and often had lunch with him. "It's hard for me to think of him as a terrorist. He was shy, well-mannered and amusing." The only time Rossetti said he saw Birk with a turban was when he appeared on a local television news show, after Mrs Gandhi's assassination and made statements that appeared to condone the murder.

Birk's television appearance did not go unnoticed by the FBI's special agents who had been alerted to keep a vigilant eye on Sikh terrorist activities. Law enforcement authorities are reluctant to reveal much about the circumstances under which they were tipped off about Birk's underground activities, but according to one source, Birk first approached a gun-runner, who chanced to be an undercover informant for the FBI, in early November "and made some vague enquiries about paramilitary commando training". The FBI then proceeded to lay the trap.

Meanwhile, undercover FBI agents and informants gained the confidence of Birk and some of his cronies, Lal Singh and

SIKH EXTREMISTS

The US Network

US and Indian intelligence authorities are convinced that a small minority of Sikhs, who are determined to create Khalistan, have spawned small, scattered networks of fragmented terrorist organisations with no centralised chain of command. These terrorist cells have a central purpose but deliberately avoid contact with one another. There is no apparent centralised brain masterminding their activities either.

Members of these groups come from varied economic and class backgrounds. While it is difficult to pin down where specific sums of money for specific purposes come from, the general sources of their finance are no secret. The international Sikh community, as enterprising and innovative as its Indian counterpart, is awash in money. Sikh millionaires—engineers, traders, physicians—abound all over the world and donate generously to causes in gurudwaras. Many of the North American gurudwaras now out of bounds for Hindu worshippers, have been taken over by radical elements who raise funds for various causes.

According to intelligence sources, both extreme right wing and left wing ideologues are involved in fuelling the Khalistan cause, aimed at destabilising Punjab and India. Intelligence briefs reveal that there are three known terrorist training camps in Pakistan, just across the Indian border. The closest one is near Gurdaspur, where Sikh guerrillas are being trained by Pakistani army officers. About 200 guerrillas from these camps are believed to have crossed the border into India, shortly before the waves of terrorist bombings rocked the country.

The Government of India has picked up a 'hit list' of Indian politicians to be assassinated, including Rajiv Gandhi. Heading the list is the name of the late prime minister Indira Gandhi, crossed out in red ink. The Indian Government is also apprehensive about communist infiltration of the Sikh movement in Punjab, but is uncertain as to whether the Soviets are playing an active role in the destabilisation campaign. The Indian Government recently captured a communist document prepared by a militant Sikh extremist, who has been in and out of England. The document is a Naxalite blueprint for terrorism, guerrilla warfare and the consequent destabilisation of India, using Punjab as a stepping-stone into the larger subcontinent.

The International Islamic Permanent Tribunal of Lahore, headed by Abdel Majid Turab Zamani, is described in one report as "a coordinating centre for radical Muslim/Khalistani operations into the subcontinent." Zamani has recently stressed the need for "convergence between Indian Muslims and Sikhs for destroying the Indian nation state". The London branch of this tribunal is managed by Siddiqui, a member of the Islamo-Marxist "Muslim Research and Planning Institute".

Al Nusrat, a Frankfurt-based Pakistani publication of Libyan-connected former PPP members, has published regular articles supporting Khalistan. Finances for Al Nusrat are apparently derived from the Islamic Council of Europe led by London-based Moazzan Ali, Pakistani member of the Jamaat-e-Islami.

Sikh members of the Babbar Khalsa are believed to be receiving terrorist training from the PLO and Red Brigade trainers at a camp in Canada, run by Jon Vanderhorst, one of the world's best-known free-lance mercenaries. The camp is located in British Columbia, outside George, in the Okanagan Valley. Some of the extremist Sikhs arrested or identified in the 'Gandhi plot', that was uncovered by the FBI last month are believed to be hard core supporters of Talwinder Singh Parmar's Babbar Khalsa. They are understood to have travelled from Vancouver to Detroit and then into California and New York where all their movements and activity were monitored by US intelligence forces.

Protest rally being held in London: ominous portents

The International Sikh Students Federation has been established as the student arm of the American-based World Sikh Organisation, now led by expatriate General J.S. Bhullar. The federation is a foreign regrouping of the All India Sikh Students Federation of Amrik Singh, who was killed during the storming of the Golden Temple along with Bhindranwale. One intelligence summary described Amrik Singh as the recipient of funds from the Russian KGB.

A Vancouver-based Babbar Khalsa operative, by the name of Purewal, has travelled to Pakistan several times and is believed to be responsible for recruiting volunteers from both the Babbar and Dal Khalsas. The terrorist recruits reportedly travel on Pakistan International Airline flights from London into Pakistan and from there infiltrate India. The recent transistor bombings in Delhi are reported to have been carried out by these recruits as well as former Indian army Sikh extremists, many of whom were Bhindranwale's advisors.

The leader of the Khalistan movement in West Germany is Triluk Singh who claims "good cooperation" between members of the Kashmir Liberation Front and the 4,000 Sikhs who live in Germany. About 1,000 West German Sikhs are reportedly active in the Khalistan movement. Triluk Singh and Canada-based Talwinder Singh Parmar, who was recently in Germany, are expected to visit a gathering of Sikhs. The meeting is also being billed as a major "strategy session".

Ammand Singh, both casual workers in their mid-twenties, residing in New York. They set up a meeting between them and a secret agent code-named 'A' in the FBI's reports. The agent is a top counter-terrorism intelligence expert, schooled in urban and guerrilla warfare, explosives and automatic weapons who works closely with the FBI. He is a recipient of the Congressional Medal of Honour for Bravery. The undercover agents, posing as Birk's collaborators met him and Lal Singh in a hotel room in New York City on January 26. The entire proceedings were videotaped by concealed FBI cameras. 'A' told Birk and Singh that he headed a mercenary gun-running and guerrilla training organisation based in Birmingham, Alabama, and that he might be able to meet their needs.

The group wanted to overthrow the Government of India by violent means and to create a loss of confidence in the present system through bombing a nuclear power plant, bridges, hotels and public buildings.

Taking their cue, Birk and Singh told 'A' that their group wanted to overthrow the Government of India by violent means. One tactic to be employed was to create a loss of confidence in the present system through bombing strategic locations in India—a nuclear power plant, bridges, hotels, public buildings. Also confiding their plan to assassinate Rajiv Gandhi and other political figures, Birk and Singh asked 'A' to provide the necessary military training to implement such plans. They requested specific training in the use of explosives, automatic weapons, chemical warfare and urban guerrilla tactics. According to their plan, 'A' would train a cadre of men in the US, following which he would then travel to India in the capacity of the group's adviser, until such time as they seemed proficient enough to operate on their own. This initial cadre would, in turn, train others. At the same meeting Birk and Singh are also recorded to have asked 'A' to obtain C-4 plastic explosives for them as well as false US passports to facilitate exit and entry into India for members of the terrorist group.

Following this meeting, the FBI put Birk and his group under comprehensive surveillance including telephone taps. The next meeting between the earlier three and Ammand Singh again took place in a hotel on February 20. Birk acted as spokesman, while conferring regularly with the other two in Punjabi. 'A' was subsequently given dates and deadlines. Birk was anxious that the initial phase be completed by May 10. 'A' was asked to make provision for smuggling arms and explosives into India, adding that they needed explosives sufficient to blow up the size of Triboro, Brooklyn or the Queensboro bridges and a large 36-storey building. The weapons order included small arms and machine-guns, particularly the Ingram 9mm, Mach-10, and grenade launchers. 'A' said he would be able to supply them.

Rajiv Gandhi

During the course of subsequent telephonic conversations between 'A', Birk and Singh from February 20 to April 27, Birk revealed that they had found a remote, wooded site in Columbia, New Jersey, appropriate for the training. It was during this drive to Columbia that Birk asked 'A' to find someone to assassinate Rajiv Gandhi. The group also revealed they wanted at first to do this in India, but changed their plan when the prime minister's visit to the US was announced for June. In a bid to lead them on, the agent recommended three options—the costs, merits and feasibility of which were relatively weighed by Birk and Singh, who then made their selection. Details of the payment were left till later.

The die was now cast. About two dozen Sikh terrorists were to reach Columbia, New Jersey, to begin training on May 6. 'A' was to deliver the weapons and explosives on that day. But 'A' promised to do more than that. According to a hidden agenda worked out by the FBI, and the Secret Service, the entire site would be secretly wired with tape-recorders and cameras to record the evidence.Plans had been made by the FBI, the US Attorney in New York, the New Jersey Police, and the Secret Service to raid the training camp on May 8 and arrest the terrorists. But there developed a twisted subplot that created an unforeseen diversion in the FBI's plans to unravel the wider 'Gandhi plot'.

Bhajan Lal had arrived in New Orleans on April 29 for eye surgery. Upon completion of the lens implant at the Louisiana State University Medical Center, Lal was moved to the Meridien Hotel, where he was expected to spend two weeks for follow-up treatment. The Indian Embassy had routinely cautioned the State Department that Lal's name had figured on various 'hit lists' compiled by radical Sikh organisations and that he would require protection. The State Department informed the New Orleans FBI office that Lal was to be treated as an "Internationally protected official". The FBI in turn, notified the New Orleans Police Department (NOPD), which immediately put into action a local 'risk assessment programme.' But little did these officials know—until May 3—that a conspiracy had been hatched to kill Bhajan Lal. Birk and associates, having discovered that Lal was in New Orleans, worked out a plan to murder him.

Birk seemed confident that the mercenary organisation led by 'A' could be relied upon to help in a quick kill. 'A' put Birk and an accomplice, Sukhvinder 'Suki' Singh, 30, another New York resident, in touch with Thomas Morris, a Birmingham-based FBI undercover special agent, who, 'A' said, would help the Sikhs with the Bhajan Lal murder. Birk and Suki travelled to mingham and contacted Morris on the phone, telling him that they wanted to hire a hit man to assassinate an Indian official in New Orleans. Morris, who was duly recording the conversation, said that none was available. The two Sikhs responded by saying that they would do the job themselves, and asked Morris to help them purchase a .45 revolver.

In order to create a detailed paper trail and a record that would carry weight in a court of law, as evidence of a murder conspiracy, Morris directed Suki and Birk to another undercover FBI informant in Birmingham for the purchase of the weapon. Subsequently, the two Sikhs bought a .45 calibre semi-automatic pistol on May 4. An FBI agent, monitoring the scheme, noted the serial number of the weapon. Birk and Suki left Birmingham by 1 p.m., in a dark-grey Celebrity sedan. Under the impression that Morris as well as the gun dealers they had dealt with were 'A's, contacts, and therefore fellow conspirators, Birk and Suki had no reservations about taking them into full uninhibited confidence.

But on May 3, as soon as Birk contacted Morris and asked for a 'hit man', the FBI office in Birmingham, acting on information given by Birk, contacted the FBI office in New Orleans. The NOPD was advised to strengthen their guard. Until then Lal had a solitary Indian security guard to protect him. But on that day, 14 members of the NOPD's intelligence unit went into action. About half of them were detailed directly to protect Lal, and set up a command post outside his room. Sergeant Graig Jennings, of the NOPD intelligence cell, said in an interview: "We advised the minister in general about what was happening on May 3. But on May 4, after we learned that Birk and Suki had obtained a weapon and were on their way to New Orleans we went to Level 1 alert. We were now in constant touch with the FBI, the Secret Service, the State Department, and the US Attorney's office in New York and New Jersey. The Indian minister did not show much concern about the threat."

The arrests however created a new set of problems. Right until the moment the suspects were nabbed, opinion remained divided between law enforcement authorities about the timeliness of the action.

NOPD officials had in fact, advised Lal to consider changing hotels and cancelling a dinner engagement with a friend for that night. However, Lal insisted on going out so the NOPD provided him with a police limousine with a follow-up car in tow. He left at 7.30 p.m. and returned around 9.45 p.m. Within minutes of Lal's return, NOPD officers arrested four suspects on the sidewalk outside the hotel. The four included Birk, Suki, and Jasbir Sandhu, 24, Virender Singh, 25, also of New York. Eight days later, the police arrested Jatinder Singh Ahluwalia, a New Orleans taxi-driver, who had been seen consorting with the other four suspects on the night of May 4. The arrests made that night can be attributed to the presence of mind of an unusually alert Indian government official, who had reached Lal's hotel earlier during the day.

Bhajan Lal

While on his way out through the hotel lobby facing the New Orleans French Quarter, the official had spotted suspicious characters who appeared to be of Indian origin. They were stalking the hotel from across the street. Without further ado, he informed the police. According to a filed report, one of the arresting officers spoke to Virender Singh shortly after he was detained. The officer quizzed Singh about what he was doing in New Orleans. "Singh, who appeared nervous, nodded at Jasbir Sandhu's direction, and stated: 'We're together. He does not speak good English,' asking: 'Do you want me to tell you the truth?' The arresting officer replied: 'Yes, please'. Singh stated: 'We are here to hurt him.' The arresting officer then asked: 'The man in the hotel?' To which, Singh nodded in affirmation, refusing to answer any further questions."

The following day, on obtaining a legal warrant, police searching the car in which Birk and Suki had travelled to New Orleans, found the .45 semi-automatic under the right front seat, a 38 calibre colt, two daggers, a kirpan, a map of New Orleans with a circle around the area Bhajan Lal was staying, as well as several newspaper photographs of Lal.

The arrests, however, created a new set of problems. Right until the moment the suspects were nabbed, opinion remained divided between law enforcement authorities about the timeliness of the action. One school of thought held that the gang should have been arrested only during the actual murder attempt. Sergeant Jennings believed that would have been running too great a risk. "Birk and his crew were out there making a final reconnaissance. The next step for them would have been the murder attempt. They had no local address or any overnight bookings. My guess is, they wanted to make a quick hit and drive back the same day, without leaving a paper trail."

Even after the arrests, the authorities were unable to take a decision whether to indict the four immediately, or let them off without so much as an inkling that the wider 'Gandhi plot' had been penetrated and capture them later at the training camp. On May 6, about 20 State Department security personnel and officials arrived in New Orleans for a high-level strategy session that lasted two days. The authorities were in agreement that the failure of Birk and his associates to return to New York had probably already roused the suspicions of many of the other conspirators, spurring them to flee. They decided to wait until May 13 before announcing the arrests. The delay would also give the FBI's New York office adequate time to prepare a detailed case indicting Birk, Lal Singh and Ammand Singh on charges of attempting to assiassinate Rajiv Gandhi.

Ahluwalia, the New Orleans taxi-driver who was seen on May 4 outside Lal's hotel, was trach down and finally arrested in his home by FBI agents on May 12. the authorities had deliberately decided to stall his arrest since he was a local resident and the news would have been given unwanted publicity in the local papers—thereby jeopardising the deliberate black-out that the FBI wanted so carefully to maintain. Ahluwalia, who is otherwise a clean-shaven sikh, insisted on sporting a turban at the time of his arrest.

On May 13, nearly ten days after the original arrests, US prosecutors in New York and New Orleans issued simultaneous announcements to the effect that they had foiled a plot by Sikh terrorists to assassinate Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal. Birk will be tried on separate charges in both states. Meanwhile, the conspirators are being held without bond. The authorities fear that if he is freed on bail, Birk is likely to flee the country. His passport bears witness to his travels in virtually every country in Europe.

INDO-FRENCH TIES

Behind the Glitter

THE FESTIVAL of India in Paris is not going to be all glamour and glitter. While gay Parisians savour Indian delicacies and Munna waltzes to western tunes, France and India are going to clinch crucial issues that will go a long way in strengthening bilateral relations. Which is why such considerable importance is being attached to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's visit to France, where he will arrive a virtually unknown figure, but for vague comparisons in the press for his "remarkably identical interests" with his French counterpart, the 39-year-old Laurent Fabius.

With the espionage affair conveniently forgotten, the Indian cultural efflorescence will, without doubt, dazzle the French, who perhaps are consumed by the most voracious cultural appetites in the continent. But there is more to the visit than the Festival.

Befitting the vivid cultural ambience of the visit, a major announcement is likely regarding the opening of an ambitious cultural centre in Paris. A cultural centre is seen as the most natural culmination of such an extensively mounted cultural pageant as L'Annee de l'Inde. Details regarding the venue, financial assistance, and the cost of maintenance remain to be ironed out. In this respect, while the various Alliance Francaises in India are on to a good deal there is virtually no parallel Indian centre here.

Heading the Prime Minister's agenda are bilateral talks with French President Francois Mitterrand and Fabius. He is also expected to meet leading members of the socialist cabinet, including Charles Hernu, Roland Dumas, Pierre Beregovoy and Edith Cresson. One vexing tripwire that will come under searching scrutiny is French financial terms, which are notoriously unattractive. The West Germans and the British consistently offer better financial packages. If Indo-French trade and commerce is to really take off, the French will have to offer competitive rates. If not, this vast effort would be yet another tale of squandered chances.

Besides traditional favourites like disarmament issues, one topic where Mitterrand could get fulsome accolades would be for his formidable tour de force at the recent Bonn summit. There, western media attention was spotlighted on Mitterrand's efforts at countering the technical challenge posed by Ronald Reagan's 'Strategic Defence Initiative' with his own proposal, the 'Eureka Project'. 'Eureka' envisages European cooperation in such areas as lasers, artificial intelligence, high-powered computers and microprocessors. What was of more specific interest to the developing world was the fact that the French President stymied all efforts to agree on a date for the GATT conference. The essence of his argument in Bonn was: "GATT consists of over 90 nations, not just the seven of us. We ought to be consulting the developing countries too." Whatever label is attributed to it, a 'new international monetary conference' or a 'new Bretton Woods meeting', the idea would have natural Indian endorsement.

Display at the Paris air show

Rajiv Gandhi is also expected to address a special session of the beleagured UNESCO. The organisation has circled its wagons and is now beset by its executive board's budget battle. India has more or less been supportive of the organisation and its besieged Director-General, Amadou Mahtar M'Bow, unlike a growing number of western nations which have excoriated UNESCO's profligate ways. Any expressions of support for UNESCO will no doubt be more than welcomed by its corraled director-general.

The prime minister is also scheduled to visit the renowned Paris air show at Le Bourget, which every two years unravels the latest in aircraft both military and civil as well as a dazzling paraphernalia of avionics and aerial weaponry. This year, Hindustan Aeronautics Limited too will be represented and will display its latest turbo-prop trainer, the HTT-34.

However, there is renewed anxiety among security experts following the publication of a secret American Embassy document that predicts a terrorist attack at the air show. Officials here have already been disquieted by the dire threats from 'Khalistan' zealots in London against the Indian prime minister as well as by the fact that Jagjit Singh Chauhan has been paying clandestine visits to France with the backing of a Paris-backed organisation, CIPRO. It is no help either that Rajiv Gandhi arrives here precisely a year after Operation Bluestar, a further goad for 'Khalistan' protagonists. Already, plans for Mitterrand who has been under an unprecedented security cordon during the past year and for Rajiv to 'mingle' in the 'mela' have been wisely dropped.

If armament and fighter planes have dominated news columns when Indo-French ties are discussed, one area that has escaped media attention has been the escalating scientific cooperation which could deservingly become a fulcrum of Indo-French relations in the future. Spearheading this cooperation could be the formal announcement during the prime minister's visit of an absorbing project that has been hanging fire for three years: an Indo-French centre for the promotion of advanced research in New Delhi. The idea had taken birth when the then President, Giscard d'Estaing, visited India in January 1981. The aim of this ambitious institute is to promote a binational programme of research in priority areas of futuristic technology. The protocol on the protection of the environment is yet another significant step in the rapidly expanding Indo-French scientific cooperation.

So, the festival is not going to be just fun and games, after all. While the French get to know India, the two nations are going to nail down certain issues of importance to both.

We're really pulling out the stops.

More non-stop London flights than anyone else.

Altogether we operate fourteen flights a week to London from India – that's more than any other airline. And eight of these are non-stop flights – that's also more than any other airline.

But it's not just in non-stop flying that we excel. Our service is non-stop too. Both on the ground, with our Indian Visitors Service, and in the air, with Indian stewardesses and vegetarian meals, we provide a thoroughly professional and caring service. No wonder we're the world's favourite airline.

Victims of the Anuradhapura massacre: killed in cold blood

SRI LANKA

Unbridled Terror

IT WAS all over in less than half-an-hour, a blood-splattered scene straight out of a movie by Sam Peckinpah, an exhibition in pure, unbridled terror that the Irish Republican Army (IRA) or Abu Nidhal, the Palestinian terrorist leader, would have envied. May 14 in Anuradhapura, the holiest of cities to the island's nearly 12 million Sinhalese Buddhists, turned out to be one of the bloodiest days in Sri Lankan history and a new chapter in the annals of terrorism.

At eight in the morning the street leading to the market-place and old bus station for short-distance passengers was already quite crowded with schoolchildren, accompanied by their parents, rushing for their school bus. There were the early morning shoppers and others waiting for government offices and banks to open. Vesak, the two holidays marking the Buddha's birth, enlightenment and death, had brought several thousand pilgrims by bus, train and coach to Anuradhapura, and more were still pouring in. A Ceylon Transport Board bus pulled up at the bus station and four young men in military-style uniforms and carrying AK-47s alighted and walked towards the police station some 300 yards away. Uniformed service personnel, however, are now a common sight in Anuradhapura, as indeed is the army in other parts of the island, signifying the main post-July 1983 change that has occurred in the Sri Lankan socio-political scene.

Then the rest of the passengers (more than 20, said an eyewitness later) got down and in what was perhaps a perfectly rehearsed drill, formed two rows along the sides of the street. Suddenly a command, a few words shouted, they opened up with their automatic weapons, mowing down every person in sight.

With well over 200 persons dead or bleeding to death in the street, the attackers got back into the bus and drove to the Sirimaha Bodhi, a temple and the sight of a sacred Bo tree held in great veneration by all Buddhists. They opened fire again at the temple premises killing several, including one monk and four bhikkunis (nuns). The final casualty figure given by the Government two days later was 146 but the death toll, Anuradhapura residents say, is in fact closer to 200.

Strangely, no separatist Tamil guerrilla group claimed responsibility although a report from Madras said that the Tamil Eelam Liberation Organisation (TELO) had admitted having launched the attack. But TELO officially denied it the next day. The Government, however, was sure it was an operation conducted by the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), the best-known of the militant groups, led by V. Prabhakaran. The National Security Minister Lalit Athulathmudali told INDIA TODAY: "It has all the hallmarks of a LTTE operation, especially the cold-blooded attack and its ferocity." But the LTTE has denied any involvement, and other groups have condemned the massacre in the strongest terms. "Probably they realised the international reaction was one of shock and horror," said a senior ruling United National Party (UNP) member, adding, "the Indian Government must have been greatly embarrassed too."

While Tamil opinion in Jaffna, the northern capital, Colombo and Madras views the brutal massacre as a retaliation for the killing of Tamil civilians by the troops in the north, President Jayewardene left the question open. Speaking at a ceremonial opening of a suburban police station, he said: "It is reported that the Anuradhapura attacks were acts of revenge for the killings of civilians in the north by security forces during the last few months. If civilians have been deliberately killed, it is wrong and unproductive. The security forces are trained to follow commands issued by their superiors."

Just prior to the Anuradhapura massacre, the Indian press and radio had been reporting allegations by Tamil leaders of indiscriminate killing of civilians. The president of the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF), M. Sivasithamparam, now in Madras, claimed that 150 Tamils had been killed in Valvettiturai in the north after a Sinhalese major, had been killed in a grenade attack by the separatist rebels. While Tamil sources in Jaffna put the figure much lower, the Government claimed that all the deaths were caused in "anti-terrorist operations" or when army patrols were fired upon, and the army returned the fire. "Civilians may get caught in the crossfire," said an official. However, there have been persistent reports of Tamil civilians being killed in the north and east. "In every one of these cases, we have instituted official enquiries," says Athulathmudali. The Government, nonetheless, is starting to get worried over the growing indiscipline in the armed forces. Both the US State Department in a report to Congress, and two British MP's, guests of the Sri Lanka Government, in their report to the British Parliament, have had reason to comment on this question and voice their anxiety and misgivings on the situation.

President Jayewardene dwelt at length on this issue during his speech, placing it in a much broader perspective which indicated the Government's growing worry about the role of the army. "In a democracy," he said, "the security and administrative services come under the control of the political leaders elected by the people. When such leaders are not elected by the people but have taken authority by force and keep it by force, it is a dictatorship. I will never adopt such an attitude, nor will this government permit this to happen. That is why in the direction of this war, orders are ultimately given by elected leaders, whoever may be in the seats of power." Jayewardene's speech was made a few days after a Sinhalese major had to shoot and kill a Sinhalese soldier who went berserk and killed six Tamil refugees.

After the 1971 Tamil youth insurgency, the army's ranks were rapidly swelled by Mrs Bandarnaike's government. The new recruits came largely from rural areas and were poorly trained and equipped.

Transported into an alien environment to fight a sort of a war he was not mentally or professionally equipped for, the Sinhalese soldier saw it as a war against the Tamils, a war that has gone on for 2,000 years, a history he has absorbed through myth and legend and school textbook.

THE ANURADHAPURA massacre, however, did not provoke a massive Sinhalese backlash in the south, and the community remained calm. Relieved as the Government is, no doubt, it is nontheless nagged with doubt whether the Sinhalese may be turning anti-government and feeling that the Government is incapable of coping with the separatist insurgency. State Minister Ananda Tissa de Alwis admitted that 45 per cent of the people are opposed to the Government. Prime Minister Premdasa, however, warned the opposition against thinking on capitalising on the UNP misfortunes.

With rising economic dissatisfaction, the Government may begin to feel that it is faced with the thankless situation of fighting the northern war in an increasingly hostile southern environment. Meanwhile, the Maha Sangha, the ranking Buddhist clergy, has stepped in, assuming the role of an activist intermediary, while a long quiescent and timorous opposition has suddenly sprung into action in alliance with the monks, and under their protective umbrella. The Mahanayaka Asgiriya, one of the most influential and respected members of the higher clergy, has had talks with former premier Mrs Bandarnaike and proposed that a new advisory committee on national security should be formed. In order to avoid party politics, he has suggested that he be its head. Later, he had talks with three other left-wing opposition parties.

President Jayewardene promptly summoned a conference of all heads of Sri Lanka's clergy and told them that he was ready to seek their advice. Making clear the distinction between state and church, he offered to seek and consider advice, but was obviously unwilling to make institutional changes which give a decision-making role to the clergy. "After 1983, the army was thrust into politics," says a Socialist Party leader, "now the Government may be worried that the clergy is trying to thrust itself."

INDO-US TIES

The Key Issues

THERE are interesting similarities and differences between Indira Gandhi's and Rajiv Gandhi's interactions with the United States and the Soviet Union in the formative years of their respective prime ministerships. Mrs Gandhi's first journey was to Washington, her second to Moscow. In her son's case, the process, however, is reversed; the road to Washington runs through Moscow.

Indira Gandhi began as a weak prime minister in a year of great difficulties for India—the demanding wages of the 1965 war had to be paid in the midst of near-famine conditions; India was heavily dependent on PL-480 grains from the US. Her World Bank-oriented economic advisers counselled a certain degree of submission to American prescriptions to cure the economic ailment: massive devaluation of the rupee, cut down on public subsidies and opening the economy to private foreign investment. Mrs Gandhi had to put up with heavy American pressure to mute her criticism of the bombing of North Vietnam, and was actually punished by President Johnson for praising Ho Chi Minh as a great patriot: each shipment of PL-480 grain to India was required to get the President's personal approval!

Rajiv Gandhi will be going to Washington in June not from a position of weakness but from a position of strength. India is not dependent on the United States for anything whatsoever. India is a food-exporting country. It produces more than one half of the petroleum it consumes. The Indian rupee is quoted in a number of European stock-markets. India makes a great deal of the weapons it needs, and has an assured supplier of high-tech weapons in the Soviet Union on terms and conditions no one else can match. Most of the high technology the United States would like to sell to India can be obtained from Japan and Western Europe very much on Indian terms.

The Indian modernisation programme, to be paced up by Rajiv Gandhi, cannot absorb frontier technology immediately or in the next few years except in very limited areas. Frontier technology demands a long gestation time, and tends to dictate long-term dependencies. Besides, there is the crucial question of long-term consistency and the final reliability of an American connection.

None of these points argues against an improvement in Indo-US relations. All of them, however, stress India's position of strength. Rajiv Gandhi will be in an excellent position to bargain with the Reagan Administration, demanding an adequate return for everything he may agree to give. An improvement in relations with the United States will make India's role in regional and world affairs stronger still. It will have a sobering impact on policy makers in Pakistan. It will help restore a realistic perspective in the hardliners of President Jayewardene's cabinet. It will make India's relations with the Soviet Union even more equal than it is now, and it may induce the Chinese to walk a little faster on the road of normalisation of relations with both the USSR and India.

However, for none of these desirable benefits has the prime minister to yield more than he can get from the White House. More and more countries are now adopting the bargaining model of negotiations with the United States. France, Japan and China are the principal adopters of the bargaining strategy. India must join their ranks.

A great euphoria has been built in the United States as well as India around the prime minister's Washington visit. There is undoubtedly an upsurge of American popular interest in India, created largely by a succession of films—Gandhi, the TV serial Jewel in the Crown, A Passage to India, Heat and Dust. Several American specialists in international strategic affairs have been taking a new look at India since 1982-83. One can find whiffs of fresh air in the writings and speeches of a relatively small number of American strategic thinkers candid enough to acknowledge India's rising stature as an industrialising power and the worldwide decline of American influence.

However, a technicolor arch of wishful hopes has been thrown over these cautious, tentative new-look attitudes towards India. The image-makers in Washington DC have crafted the image of India's new prime minister as young, pro-US, technology-addicted, wedded to private enterprise and a friend of the multinationals. Their counterparts in India have built a rainbow of expectations—large inflows of American private capital and frontier technologies and a fundamental change in India's time-tested development strategies. In getting ready for his Washington visit, the prime minister has to ask himself two basic questions: what does the US want from India and what is it prepared to give in return? And secondly, what it is that India would like to get from the US and what can India afford to give in return?

Americans have prospected the post-Indira Gandhi Indian scene in depth. Since November 1 last year, nearly a hundred American VIPs have been to India probing, exploring, groping, reappraising. Nothing comparable has been done by India. Rajiv Gandhi has been relying on the competent Indian ambassador in Washington, on a few of his economic advisers who have scoured the American scene since his assumption of office, and on the wisdom of men like Chairman G. Parthasarathy and Foreign Secretary Romesh Bhandari to acquire a realistic grasp of the United States in the first year of Ronald Reagan's lame-duck second Administration.

At the same time, the men who constitute his closest circle of aides are heavily drawn from the worlds of computers and multinationals; many of them have been closely connected with the World Bank and the IMF. Are they competent enough to supply the prime minister with adequate answers to the two questions he must put to them? Are they sufficiently aware of India's strength? Do they comprehend the strategy of bargaining necessarily involved in negotiations between and among nations?

From what important Americans have been saying publicly and privately since January, it is possible to frame an outline of US expectations of India ruled by Rajiv Gandhi. In the political-strategic field, they want India to be "genuinely non-aligned", that is, a little visibly distant from the Soviet Union, at least moderately critical of the Soviet military presence in Afghanistan, less "paranoid" about the flow of American arms to Pakistan, and a little more "understanding" of the US role in world affairs, including Latin American and Indian Ocean developments.

Economically, the Reagan Administration wants India to throw its doors wide open to private foreign investment, adopt a friendly attitude towards the multinationals, and further relax the terms and conditions for American participation in India's economic modernisation. Last but not the least, India must not be nasty in dealing with Union Carbide for what unfortunately did happen in Bhopal.

What, now, are India's expectations of the Reagan Administration? First and foremost, restraining the transfer of high technology arms and weapons to Pakistan. Simultaneously, effective pressure on Pakistan not to explode a nuclear device; the pressure must produce a commitment from General Zia that would be credible to the international community. Thirdly, a stand-off from South Asia, a commitment not to supply arms and weapons to India's smaller neighbours, and a lowering of naval activity in the Indian Ocean.

On the economic side, India's first expectation is the relaxation of quota and other visible and not-so-visible restrictions on exports to the United States. Increasing US private capital investment in select key sectors of the Indian economy largely on the terms and conditions India has offered, and which are found to be acceptable (even if not covetable) by Japan and the West European countries. Last but not the least, India should be allowed to import without restrictions and without conditions some of the latest technologies it may need, and the supplies must be assured over a long time.

What can India give the United States if one or more of its expectations are met by Reagan? A visible distance from the Soviet Union? Lowering the profile of Indo-Soviet friendship? A no-war pact with Pakistan? Muting criticism of American policies and activities in Central America, the Middle East and southern Africa? An Indian version of Reaganomics? Giving US multinationals equity control and unlimited profit export as a price for investment in India? Purchase of American arms without insisting on transfer of military technology? Giving up India's support for the international conference on the Indian Ocean now delayed till 1987? Supporting Israel rather than the PLO, South Africa rather than SWAPO?

When it comes to the bargaining strategy during the prime minister's Washington visit, he will find that the Reagan Administration cannot or shall not give him much. A new treaty involving as much as $ 6 billion in economic and military aid to Pakistan covering the latter half of the decade is under negotiation. Some US sources indicate that it is almost wrapped up.

Nor will Rajiv Gandhi find much scope to increase Indian exports to the US. The US is not India's number one trade partner if the value of the sale of Bombay High crude, totalling nearly $1 billion in 1984, is taken off the two-way turnover of $3 billion. Indian exports to the US fluctuate within a narrow margin of $1 billion and $1.4 billion. Apart from petroleum, readymade garments and diamonds are the only two items whose exports touch $100 million a year. With another slow-down coming upon the US economy, protectionist pressures mounting, and a virtual trade war raging between Washington and Tokyo, it is highly doubtful if Indo-US trade can pick up very much in the next few years.

Rajiv Gandhi will be in an excellent position to bargain with the Reagan Administration, demanding an adequate return for everything he may agree to give.

Nor will the prime minister find the MNCs bending over backwards to invest in India unless he is willing to give them terms he has not had to give the Japanese, who are willing to come into the Indian market in a much bigger way, even with dual-purpose technology. Despite the liberalisation of investment terms, US private capital investment in India hasn't crossed $500,000. In contrast Americans invested in Hong Kong $2 billion, in Indonesia $1.3 billion, in the Philippines $1.24 billion and in Singapore $1.19 billion at the turn of the decade.

Which side, then, will come forward to break new ground to give a forward push to India-US relations? The Reagan Administration is the most ideologically committed regime installed in Washington since World War II. Its effective foreign policy strategists do not sit on the seventh floor of the State Department building at Foggy Bottom; they are either in the White House or in the right and far-right think-tanks or in the Pentagon. They will not change their military or economic ideology in order to woo India. They will expect Rajiv Gandhi to take two steps before they take half a step forward to meet him. Still, the prime minister may gain a modest harvest if he can play the card of India's rising strength as deftly in Washington as he did in Moscow.

But Rajiv Gandhi, sticking to the bargaining model of negotiations, may induce some far-sighted MNCs to invest in select areas of the Indian economy by and large on Indian terms. He may get the transfer of certain frontier dual-purpose technologies with no strings attached. All that he may yield is to buy certain advance weapon systems from the US provided military technology is also transferred on a long-term basis with no conditions involved. More than this level of improvement in Indo-US relations must wait upon newer times when a less ideologically committed and less bellicose cold warrior takes the presidential chair in the Oval Office.

PASSAGE TO THE WEST

THEY'RE calling it curry-colonialism. America is spiced out. Her galleries and museums are being invaded by bodhisattvas, bronze Harappan chariots, dwarf yaksas, sinuous Sivas, gilded torsos of Vishnu and an assortment of erotic sculptures. There's more to come: Banarasi brocades, temple and court jewellery, sun-baked terracotta, women painters of Mithila, princely costumes, biryani and rogan josh, Ravi Shankar and Zubin Mehta, Tantra and Vedanta, Indrani Rahman and Kathakali, folk dancers and poetry readings. It's India's answer to America's blue jeans and hamburgers, hoola hoops and blue suede shoes, bubble gum and Donald Duck, Tarzan and Little Lulu.

Exit, Coca-colonialism and Karma Cola. Enter: The Festival of India. It's the real thing. Not a flash-in-the-pan Diwali Mela, as the recent parliamentary brouhaha over the shipping of bronze sculpture from Tanjore would lead many to believe, but a transcendental thunderbolt of such intense cultural megawattage that it promises to electrify Americans and American institutions into a radically changed awareness of India.

For the next 18 months, The Festival of India, in ever-changing manifestations, will course with viral speed through America's social, cultural, academic and intellectual bloodstream. It will rage through 80 cities at a leisurely pace through just about every gallery, museum or cultural centre that ordinary Americans frequent. Grandiose in scope, comprehensive in design and unprecedented in concept, the Festival is, in a sense, India's private World Fair in the United States.

FESTIVAL OF INDIA

Pupul Jayakar, India's reigning tsarina of culture and chairman of the Festival of India's Indian committee grandiloquently described the mammoth fiesta as floating "oil lamps in tiny boats on a river, for an instant to illuminate the ripples on the water and the rapt faces of those who participate in the launching; to awaken sound, colour, mood, flavour, laughter; to set before the mirror of attention times past and times present..." The festival's Director-General in India, S.K. Mishra, a distinguished civil servant credited with the Haryana Tourism success story, and its chief impresario in America, Niranjan Desai, the low-key, Washington-based minister counsellor for culture, are united in their views of what the Festival will achieve for India. Specifically, Mishra believes that after the American success of films with Indian themes such as Gandhi, Heat and Dust and A Passage to India, "it's a perfect moment for India to cash in, to change existing prejudices about India in the western world and to signal a new era of Indo-American cooperation and exchange". Desai says the immediate, concrete benefits for India will be in the areas of tourism, books, movies, investment and trade. "These are the things we want but cannot get till we alter our image. We are still trapped in the Heat and Dust and Indiana Jones syndrome. We have to show that India is not only exotic but contemporaneously exotic as well as modern and competent."

The festival is perhaps the most ambitious and aggressive diplomatic initiative ever attempted by India—or for that matter any other nation—in a foreign country. In gestation since Mrs Gandhi's triumphant visit to the United States in 1982, it has officially been in preparation since a Directorate of Festivals of India was set up, with its own under-secretary, director and director-general and independent offices in New Delhi's Vigyan Bhavan last year. Aimed squarely at the hearts and minds of the American people, its concept is founded in the belief that the most effective method of opinion building is when people are able to talk directly to people across continents.

Indian diplomats and policy-makers in the United States have constantly agonised over the lack of a continuing India lobby capable of influencing American Government, opinion makers and the media in the direction of India's interests. Ambassadors and plenipotentiaries have come and gone creating minuscule furrows of influence in Washington. American Indophiles and pro-Indian academics have talked, mostly to one another, in small, incestuous circles. But an orchestrated assault has been missing, of the kind that China—starting with its ping-pong diplomacy—attempted with its wooing of America. And China succeeded in one critical aim: American public opinion, formerly wedded to the concept of protecting Taiwan against the "Red menace" on the mainland, moved rapidly away from its traditional stance to accept Chinese interests in that region. Changed perceptions often lead to changed politics. And one country's initiative can lead to another taking the cue: the pre-festival publicity of India in America has been so successful that already China is making a bid to organise a festival of its own in the United States in 1988-89.

In essence, the Festival of India is a cultural Trojan Horse carrying within its belly the armies of trade and diplomacy. "It's a backcloth for political initiatives," says Martand Singh, organiser of one of the Festival's major shows, the exhibition of princely court costumes at the Metropolitan Museum in New York. The Festival simultaneously seeks to sound the clarion call of "Brown is Beautiful" while creating within America a reservoir of goodwill—a people's constituency capable of influencing American policy-planners of the future.

Notwithstanding the existence in America of a powerful, successful and wealthy Indian community, India has traditionally been perceived by Americans as a distant constellation of fuzzball images. That's changing, rapidly and dramatically. The American Rip Van Winkle has awakened—in India. The shattering and fast-occurring chain of cataclysmic events such as the Indian army action inside the Golden Temple, Mrs Gandhi's assassination, the anti-Sikh riots and the Bhopal tragedy, have catapulted India into media headlines. On the other hand, the success of several film and television ventures on India have deepened a cultural interest in this Asian country among Americans. These vignettes and images of India past and present have merely whetted the curiosity of Americans about India. Yet, modern India remains a country they know little about. Says Tanen of the Indo-US Subcommission on Education & Culture: "Gandhi took America by storm. It focussed the attention of many Americans on India's philosophy and the life of this great Indian and even world leader."

The media invasion that began with the movies has steadily and indomitably built up to the arrival of the Festival of India. "Return of the Raj" screamed a recent banner headline in the New York Post displaying Indian fashions. "The Raj rages" said an article in the San Francisco Chronicle. And Vanity Fair carried a piece entitled "Raj-ma-Taj". There is little doubt that America's current fascination with India stems from British films and TV series on the Raj that have proved greater hits in America than in Britain. This phenomenon has bred vituperative criticisms from one section of Indians like writers Salman Rushdie and Gita Mehta. The Raj nostalgia, says Mehta, has converted India into a "costume drama dream factory—unbeatable entertainment. There is still some argument over whose perception of India should be paramount, the native's or the imperialist's?"

Inversely, it has to be admitted that the reason why voices of serious Indian writers like R.K. Narayan, V.S. Naipaul, Anita Desai, Rushdie and Mehta are suddenly being heard in American magazines and newspapers is because of the huge interest serials like Jewel in the Crown have aroused on American television networks. The airing of the Raj nostalgia is merely a prelude to the creation of more serious, thought-provoking interest about India. A recent article in Newsday entitled "Passages to India" comments that "this impending onslaught of Indian culture (the Festival of India) serves to put the Raj in perspective—a 100-year episode in a 5,000-year civilisation. The Raj was a moment; India is eternal." Writing in Life magazine columnist Loudon Wainwright propounds his theory on why Americans are so enraptured by the Raj. "My own feeling about Jewel and Passage is that they somehow offer us the opportunity to have it both ways. Watching them we can identify with the British and despise them too. And we can feel warm and tender toward the Indians without sharing the guilt of exploiting them.... It's an easy moral victory for us. It gives reign to our sense of superiority over the British. It's lovely to see them taken down a peg."

And in another article entitled "India is on Our Minds—But Whose India?", William Borders, New Delhi correspondent of the New York Times, writes: "In the long history of India the presence of the British was only a little blip and a lot that is great about the place has nothing to do with them. It used to amuse me to imagine the first Englishman who saw the Taj Mahal. Whoever he was, when he came around the corner and cast his eyes on this magnificent structure, don't you suppose he wondered just a bit whether or how much these people really needed the civilizing influence of the British....

"The exciting thing about India today is the splendid adventure of its democracy.... It really is a free society and miraculously it is producing enough food and acquiring a high technological sophistication in its manufacturing. I don't mean that a story about India's self-sufficiency in automobile parts would make a better film; it just seems a shame if those aspects of the country get overlooked in all the current fascination with the glamour of the Raj... Like the Taj Mahal, the Festival of India is a reminder to Americans that there was an India worth paying attention to long before the British acquired the place."

WHATEVER the reasons behind it, India, as the Washington Post recently proclaimed, "is In." USA Today has called 1985 "unquestionably the year of India" and has predicted that the festival will produce a new "groundswell of interest in India" that will lead to the growth of Indian fashions, Indian food, the sale of Indian furniture in fancy department stores, Indian gift items, and travel to India.

Vanity Fair, in a cover story entitled "India Boom-Boom", reported on "turban fever" raging through the world of haute couture as a result of the interest in India. And Art Malik—who plays Hari Kumar in Jewel in the Crown—models Indian-style clothes under the heading "Art Throb". The magazine also featured an official list of Indiaphiles—"those who have been seduced by the subcontinent"—that included: American journalist Walter Cronkite; actress Goldie Hawn; Dame Peggy Ashcroft; poet Octavio Paz; film maker Louis Malle; composer Yehudi Menuhin; and J.K. Galbraith. And over a segment entitled "Fashionwallahas", the magazine struck this high note by quoting from Gita Mehta: "The Indian is no better at handling reality than anyone else, but we live closer to it, so we have to take more elaborate evasive action...."

The May issue of the widely circulated Town and Country magazine carried more than 40 pages on "India: Passage to Power" a, story about "the new potentates—contemporary, worldly heirs of an ancient society setting a dynamic style for the democracy's future". Subtitled the "Movers of Modern India", the story carried photographs and reports about the Madras-based Murugappa group, Amitabh Bachchan, Dr Karan Singh of Kashmir, shipping magnate Sumati Morarjee, Pupul Jayakar, J.J. Bhabha, Ratan Tata, Satish Gujral, the Maharaja of Baroda, Maharaja "Bubbles" of Jaipur, the Nawab of Pataudi and Sharmila Tagore, R.K. Narayan, Aroon Purie of INDIA TODAY, Lalit Mohan Thapar, M.F. Husain and Harish Mahindra.

While Town and Country was busy making household words of these Indian movers and shakers, another travel magazine—Diversions—that caters to the specialised leisure needs of wealthy physicians throughout the United States was exhorting American doctors, in in-house idiom—to go to India or, at least to pay attention to the festival. "The complete life of India is something of which the European merely dreams," the magazine quoted psychoanalyst C.J. Jung. "But this year the Americans will have a glimpse of that life through the Festival of India..." Not to be left behind, Connoisseur magazine—meant for Americans with a discerning taste in entertainment—carried a pictorial essay on polo ("it tests the horse, the rider and trainer") in which Rao Raja Hanut Singh, the Maharaja of Baria, and Colonel Billy Sodhi became American clubhouse words.

The Washington Post devoted an entire issue to Indian fashions and their forthcoming impact on the world. Several top American department stores—Bergdorf Goodman, Lord and Taylor, Bloomingdale's, Elizabeth Arden—are planning Indian promotions to coincide with the 18-month festival. Japanese designer Issey Miyake, whose clothes are first presented in Paris, is in India to create an entire collection based on Indian designs. Ralph Lauren and Calvin Klein are working on lightweight cottons. Geoffrey Beene is working on producing gold-threaded skirts based on the sari, while Michael Kars has begun to market a neo-Nehru jacket. In Paris, Jean Paul Gaultier has begun work on dressy brocades for the world market.

"India Is In, and Everyone's Going Subcontinental," read a recent headline in the New York Daily News. The News reported that fashion mogul Diana Vreeland—in conjunction with the festival—will focus exclusively on Indian court costumes for her next show at the Metropolitan Museum's Costume Institute. "People need a story to dress by, and this year it's India," says New York designer Koos Van Den Akker whose new Spring collection includes tunics and leggings in sheer cotton voiles and tropical coloured Indian silks.

The leading magazine for coin collectors—Coin World—declared 1985 "The Year of India", in a lead editorial. "India's numismatic legacy is so vast, so rich, and so complex," the editorial said, "we necessarily can offer but a brief introduction in this issue." And America's top travel magazine, Travel and Leisure rated India as one of the "hot spots" in a suggestion column entitled "Where to go".

The coming festival and related hoopla have led to a fascinating interest in the American book trade. Piled beside the latest best sellers by Danielle Steel, Stephen King and Mario Puzo in bookstores are newly-issued reprints of The Raj Quartet and A Passage to India. And a host of new books is slated for publishing to coincide with the event. Putnam are bringing out An Indian Dynasty: The Story of the Nehru-Gandhi family by journalist Tariq Ali. Due in September from W.W. Norton is The Assassination of Indira Gandhi by journalist Pranay Gupte and the same publisher will reissue The Men Who Ruled India, a two-volume work by Philip Mason, a former member of the Indian Civil Service.

Harry Abrams, publisher of fine coffee-table books has scheduled several books on India including Village India by Stephen Huyler and a glossy Festival of India Catalogue. Doubleday's list includes a book on Mother Teresa (Harper & Row is also bringing out one on the same subject) by Eileen Egan, a book on Calcutta by Dominique Lapierre, the memoirs of the Rajmata of Jaipur and a lavishly illustrated book on Indian court life called The Second Paradise by Naveen Patnaik that was specially commissioned by Jacqueline Kennedy on behalf of Doubleday when she visited India last year.

One reason why the American media, and American private enterprise, are so enthusiastic about the festival is because of its high-powered political connections—Nancy Reagan and Rajiv Gandhi are its chief patrons on the two continents, and last month, President Reagan issued a personal proclamation of support, dedicating the "Year of India" as he called it, to the memory of Mrs Indira Gandhi whose visit to Washington in 1982 had sown the seeds of the festival idea.

By international standards the festival comes cheap—$12 million, a figure, that according to Director-General Mishra, may go up to US $15 million. India's share of costs is estimated at one-third of this sum, about Rs 5 crore, of which Rs 1 crore is to be expended in hard currency. The foreign exchange sanction of US $1 million will cover the cost of the inaugural concert in Washington's Kennedy Center on June 13, pay for advertising space on American television and be used up in maintenance costs of Cultural Counsellor Desai's office in the Washington embassy.

The American expenditure has been raised from a variety of sources: the institutions hosting the events, charitable trusts and national endowments as well as American business houses such as the Boeing Company, Coca-Cola, General Foods, ITT Corporation, Lockheed, Roland International, Armand Hammer Foundation, Ford Foundation, Andrew Mellon Foundation, Pan American Airways and Phillip Morris.

"The division of expenditure," explains Mishra, "has been undertaken on the basic principle that the Indian side will pay for the passages, the shipping, packaging and insurance costs while the Americans will take care of mounting the shows and providing hospitality to the participants." Mishra reckons that the number of free passages will "easily amount to over 400" to cover the staggering load of dancers, musicians, performers, craftsmen, intellectuals, academics and journalists that will be ferried to the United States under the aegis of the Festival of India.

In America, among the hundreds of members of various committees responsible for shepherding the festivities in the fields of fine arts, performing arts, education, science and culture are included luminaries such as Jacqueline Kennedy, Dustin Hoffman, Gregory Peck,

FRANCE

Indian Summer

FIRST stop on the prime minister's tour starting this fortnight will be Paris, where he will inaugurate the year-long Festival of India in France from the base of the Eiffel Tower. It will be an evening of unparalleled grandeur, with 100-metre-long French and Indian flags draped from the Tower and the kilometre-and-a-half area known as Trocadero transformed into an Indian fairground. Thirteen triumphal arches made of Indian textiles, pith, bamboo and jute and a procession of richly caparisoned elephants and camels (rented from French circuses) will herald Rajiv Gandhi's meeting with President Francois Mitterrand, following which the prime minister will make over his gift of a baby elephant and the mela will be declared open to the residents of Paris. Thirty shops, including 18 foodstalls, selling Indian artefacts, handicrafts, toys and brightly-coloured posters from Sivakashi will throw open their shutters as over 150 folk-dancers and singers from all parts of India mingle for two days and two nights with the French public.

The idea of the prime minister sailing down the Seine in a flotilla of barges has now, for security reasons, been shelved. Instead, about 600 tiny copper pots containing water from the Ganges will be distributed among visitors to be poured into the Seine in a symbolic meeting of the two rivers; and as dusk falls over the city, thousands of oil lamps will be set afloat down the Seine to heighten the aura of an Indian wonderland. Just then, a traditional balladeer from Rajasthan will begin to sing a paean to the city of Paris from the top of the Eiffel Tower, his voice echoing over the area's magnificent sound system. No other singer has had the privilege of such a vantage point since the great French singer Edith Piaf was permitted by the city authorities many years ago.

"Our idea was to change the character of the heart of Paris completely for those moments," says New Delhi-based architect Krishna Menon who is the mela's technical director. Menon, together with Ahmedabad-based designer Dashrath Patel and a design team of eight, has been at work on the project since September last year. It has been a complex project to coordinate as at any given moment, reports Menon, the area will be flooded with 100,000 visitors.

With as spectacular a take-off, the sprawling L'Annee de L'Inde (The Year of India) will run a varied and exciting course through Mitterrand's Socialist France. While its concept was mooted by Indira Gandhi and Mitterrand, its chief architect has been the high-profile, controversial French Minister for Culture Jack Lang. Unlike the Festival of India in the United States which has been largely funded and produced by institutions and business houses, the festival in France is a government-to-government effort with a pronounced emphasis on the performing arts. There is a large selection of non-classical performing arts slated at the House of World Cultures in Paris with folk-dances, music, puppetry shows and hairdressing demonstrations throughout the year; a festival in the city of Avignon beginning July, which will premiere Peter Brook's long-awaited theatrical adaptation of the Mahabharata as well as present a prestigious assemblage of Indian classical musicians, from Kumar Gandharva to Fahimuddin Dagar, in concert; and an Autumn Festival in Paris that will feature nearly 50 of India's most celebrated vocalists, instrumentalists and dancers. In addition, there will be shows of Henri Cartier-Bresson's Indian photographs, of contemporary Indian painters, massive retrospectives of Indian film stars and directors at the Pompidou Centre, of Indian architecture and contemporary Indian textiles. The last will feature a selection of Indian fabrics and designs in a very modern mode by celebrated Japanese designer Issey Miyake.

A view of the mela site around the Eiffel Tower

The L'Annee de L'Inde hopes to revive the Indo-French connection while at the same time tide over the recent strain in the relationship caused by the espionage scandal. An estimated 50,000 French tourists are said to visit India each year, a number larger than any other European country, save Germany and they are an adventurous lot. They are known to travel to places like Palitana or Tanjore or Varkala in search of remote artistic or architectural marvels, unhampered by colonial memories or pseudo-mystical baggage. It is this burgeoning crowd of travellers that the festival hopes to encourage besides promoting trade between the two countries.

Already the first signs of an Indian Renaissance in Paris, are evident. Indian restaurants are becoming gradually popular. Indian films have left a marked impression upon the city's cultural elite and in the working class district of the Rue du Faubourg St Denis adjoining the Gare du Nord station, there are now as many as eight Indian shops doing flourishing business in spices and saris, cassette tapes and Indian bidis. In fact, Paris-based Indians refer to the area as the French Southall.

Zubin Mehta, Jack Valenti, Professor Stephen Cohen, Paul Newman, Dr Jonas Salk, Senator Pat Moynihan, Congressman Steve Solarz and Thomas Prizker, president of the Hyatt chain of hotels.

In India, the committees are made up of an overwhelming number of bureaucrats with a smattering of businessmen like Aditya Birla and Sanjay Dalmia, film-maker Girish Karnad and, architect Charles Correa. Indian industrialists have also enjoined the donation effort: the Tatas, Birlas, Mahindras, Mallya of United Breweries and Hindustan Lever have been permitted by the Government to remit up to Rs 50 lakh each in foreign exchange to fund the massive show on Indian art that opens at the Metropolitan Museum in New York this September.

Together an estimated 1,500 exhibits, many of which have never travelled out of the country before (see page 100), 200 artistes, performers and designers, nearly a 100 academics and over 20 major departments of the Government ranging from the Department of Science & Technology to the State Trading Corporation to the India Tourism Development Corporation are involved in putting together the festival that officially kicks off with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's visit on June 13. The inauguration at Washington's Kennedy Center before an invited audience of 2,000 will feature Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan in concert with Alla Rakha and Zakir Hussain on the tabla. The concert will be followed by a Kathakali dance performance and Vice-President George Bush will be the chief American guest. Although the Indian prime minister will spend five days in the United States, details of his programme and that of his family are strictly being kept under wraps for security reasons.

But the American media seems as enthusiastic about the young prime minister as the festival itself. Says Stephen R. Weisman, New Delhi correspondent of the New York Times: "Rajiv with his young and beautiful wife are bound to be a great hit in America. All he has to do is to keep smiling. The time is right for his visit and the American public is really receptive to his image."

The logistics of creating the mammoth exercise has been a stirring, if occasionally disputatious saga of mobilising new ideas, engineering talent and skills, coordinating among scores of Central and state government departments as well as personalities to create a cohesive whole. "For the first time we are facing the West in complete equality," says the festival's Indian Chairman Pupul Jayakar. "Our generation, the older generation is passing away. This festival is about how the young eyes of India see tradition."

Understandably, therefore, the most talked about exhibitions originate from her twin cultural heirs, designers Rajeev Sethi and Martand Singh. Sethi, with his meteor's tail of magicians and monkeymen, is getting ready to invigorate the Smithsonian Institution in Washington with his Aditi celebrations, while Singh, the whizkid of Vishwakarma, has New York's undisputed Queen of Fashion Diana Vreeland wrapped up in metres of gilded yardage.

CONTROVERSIES

Warring Tribes

ALMOST from its inception the Festival of India has been plagued by rows but the bitter battles of the last two months are like a cultural rendition of Star Wars. Dr Sihare of the National Museum rowing with Pupul Jayakar, Opposition MP's K.P. Unnikrishnan and S. Jaipal Reddy taking up cudgels with Minister for Culture K.P. Singh Deo, dancers Sonal Mansingh, Yamini Krishnamurthy and Uma Sharma squabbling with Chairman of the Sangeet Natak Akademi Dr Narayana Menon and nameless other warring bureaucrats, designers, journalists, performers have unleashed enough venom to fill up a snake pit. Last fortnight, however, matters came to a head when, at a public discussion in Delhi organised by the Indian Archaeological Society to debate whether it was wise to ship invaluable samples of Indian art abroad, Mrs Jayakar was shouted down each time she rose to speak, and Dr Sihare called her a "liar" twice before a packed hall when she claimed that she had not seen all the lists of masterpieces requested for.

Controversy No. 1 is: can priceless, and irreplaceable pieces of ancient Indian sculpture such as the massive stone female figure known as the Didargunj Yakshi dating from the 3rd century B.C. suffer damage if taken on long journeys and will the display abroad of a group of Tanjore bronzes, the only ones of their kind belonging to temples in Tamil Nadu, offend the religious susceptibilities of their worshippers? Art scholars like Karl Khandalavala and Dr Sihare say yes. Mrs Jayakar says it was up to the experts to decide but they vacillated.

The fact of the matter is that, in the case of the Tanjore bronzes answers to both questions concern neither the morality of the issue nor the hazards of conservation. Originally when the nine bronzes (five belonging to the Tanjore Art Gallery and four to the Paruthiyur temple) were requested for by Dr Pramod Chandra, the Washington National Gallery of Art's guest curator for the "Sculpture of India" show, Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran had refused. When he was prevailed upon to agree, everyone from Mrs Jayakar and Dr Sihare it seems, extended their blessings to the loan. Dr Sihare even made the request in writing. But when it was discovered in Parliament that the temple sculptures, in fact, may have been in worship or that they were probably stolen property, all hell broke loose—and the minister for culture seemed utterly clueless. Grave embarrassment was caused, the matter was taken to court, and though the court gave its assent for their display abroad, only the museum bronzes have gone to America and not the temple ones.

Points of controversy: the Tanjore bronzes (above) that did not go and (below) the dancers who will not dance

Meanwhile, Dr Sihare has changed position, claiming that he is the victim of intrigue, and that he has all along believed it would be dangerous to allow priceless pieces out of the country. The Didargunj Yakshi and several other important pieces, including five from the recent Sanghol excavations in Punjab, winged their way to Washington last week, three weeks after the show opened. But the war in Delhi continues.

Controversy No.2 is less spiteful and only a shade more colourful, because it concerns the state of pique of India's three leading prima donnas. Yamini Krishnamurthy, Sonal Mansingh and Uma Sharma have for years been the reigning divas of dance, so they were less than appreciative when the Chairman of the Sangeet Natak Akademi Dr Menon in a television interview mumbled something about young, new dancers representing India in the forthcoming festivals in France and the US. At no point did he make any reference, by name or implication, to the troubled trio who, nonetheless, took it as a deep slight. Their form of protest was unique: expected to perform at a concert in memory of the great dancer Balasaraswathi last month, they came on stage to read out their letter of protest attacking Narayana Menon who was sitting in the front row. Walking out of the function, they went to town denouncing Menon and the Akademi's selection. Retorted Menon: "There are hundreds of dancers in the country, not just these three. We will invite young dancers not because of their youth but because of their quality."

Star turns by performing artistes developing into star tantrums is providing the Festival of India secretariat with regular headaches. Director-General Mishra explains that in several of the performing arts festivals to be held in the United States, sponsors such as the Lincoln Center in New York which will host a series of concerts through September have commercialised the events and have made independent selections of the performers. Still, troubles abound. Not being invited to the inaugural concert on June 13 in Washington has become a major bone of contention.

"Much of the hysteria associated with the Festival of India arises out of lack of professionalism. Exhibitions aren't ego events, people involved in the festival should try and remain anonymous," says Martand Singh, organiser of the costume exhibition who modestly keeps insisting that it is Diana Vreeland's show, not his. But king-size egos and vainglorious power politics have gone a long way in converting the festival image into a cesspool of controversy at home.

Indian life cycle, coincides with the Smithsonian's Folklife Festival which will re-create the ambience of an Indian mela culminating in the burning of a Ravana on July 5, the day after American Independence. A whirling melange of about 80 craftsmen and performers for both events—acrobats and balladeers, toymakers and drum-beaters—are presently undergoing an orientation programme at New Delhi's Ashok Hotel. Overseeing the operation is the Indophile daughter of Senator Moynihan. "I show them postcards and maps and photographs of Washington D.C.," says 27-year-old Maura Moynihan, her all-Indian outfit appropriately worn with an all-American T-shirt. Other than taking down details of their eating habits, introducing them to American currency and the American Constitution, she is also responsible for instructing her colleagues back home on the necessity of providing Indian-style lavatories. "We will have special frames built on toilets so they can comfortably squat on them."

Sethi's other coup de theatre is an exhibition known as "The Golden Eye" for the Cooper-Hewitt Museum in New York. Renowned international designers and architects were invited to visit India and use traditional materials and skills to create their own designs. Ettore Sotsass from Italy has designed a dining-room, complete with flooring and chandelier. Mario Bellini, another designer from Italy, has created a cane gazebo, marble couches and a sandstone bench so smooth it feels like silk to the touch. American fashion designer Mary MacFadden has produced an entire collection based on her Indian sojourn and designed a Mughal garden. Sir Hugh Casson, president of Britain's Royal Academy of Art, has produced a lobby of tiles and trellis work as well as a remarkable glass bed. Jack Larsen has produced rugs in crewel work, screens of brocade and wall surfaces of Bhagalpur tussore. I.M. Pei, the architect, has designed a lamp in stone while Milton Glaser, pundit of graphic design, has created toys and jewellery. Says Sethi about the mingling fusion of concepts, nationalities and mediums: "Art does not come to us as the West will have it, categorised in styles, schools or chronology. Art is a holistic concept and comes together in a variety of interconnected mediums."

Some Indian designers disagree with Sethi, who believes that the raison d'etre of the festival isn't to hold a tamasha but to create something permanent and reinforce the spirit of commerce. Says muralist and architect Satish Gujral of Sethi's artistic diversifications: "It's nothing but an extension of colonial slavery. To start with, a foreign designer cannot be expected to collect more than superficial impressions about a traditional craft in a few days. Moreover, it's sacrilege to transpose the medium of traditional crafts."

Other Indian artists question the very premise of holding a Festival of India. While painter M.F. Husain dismissed the whole exercise as a display of Pupul Jayakar's indiscriminate arbitration—"she only thinks anything which is 5,000 years old is art"—his fellow painter Krishen Khanna is more specific in his charges. "There's nothing wrong per se in wanting to show your culture abroad," he argues, "but it's how we do it that matters. You simply cannot have an indigestible inundation of India. There is such a thing as surfeit of culture."

Opinions vary, but even the most senior organisers of the Festival express a certain queasiness about America's cultural offerings, or lack of them, to India. Dr John Hubbard, president emeritus of the University of Southern California and chairman of the Indo-US Subcommission on Education & Culture, points out that America may not have anything of comparable value to return. "Okay", he says, "the theme is America and India—show and tell. It's not a contest, but suppose it is. Then you win hands down."

The trouble lies also with what Indian arbiters of culture think their fellow Indians should see from America. Dr Laxmi Sihare, director of the National Museum, for instance, thinks that the Americans should be sending their great art collections such as the Picasso retrospective. Rajeev Sethi thinks such shows would be "elitist". He'd like to see computers supplanted in Connaught Place or the Bread and Puppet Company travel to Indian villages.

But as S.K. Mishra and Martand Singh point out, such debates are not within the ambit of the Festival of India, which stands as an independent entity away from the give and take of the hubbub of bilateral exchange: "At this moment in time, it's we who want to display our culture abroad and if we want better exchange we must prove our bona fides first, we must determine the criteria for cultural import", says Singh.

All such soul-searchings, outpourings of discontent, rumblings of fear and favour, however, will be banished next week when amidst the dazzle of the Empire State Building in New York lit up in colours of the Indian flag and to the strains of Ravi Shankar's sitar, the curtain will finally go up on the Festival of India in America. It will, as American policy-makers with an interest in India have pointed out, be a signal for a new era in Indo-American relations that began with the rapprochement that the late prime minister Indira Gandhi's 1982 visit to the US created. "It will be a demonstration of our ancient culture exploding with contemporary advancements in science and technology," says festival Chairman Jayakar. But a recent advertisement by a travel agency in Indian newspapers promoting cheap fares to America puts it more succinctly. "Come to America," it announces, "India is waiting."

BIHAR

Confusion Reigns

BIHAR is fast turning into a huge graveyard for education. Last fortnight, the Bindeshwari Dubey Government, despite its oft-repeated announcements of steps to improve the state's education system, suddenly scrapped the Bihar Intermediate Education Council (BIEC) set up in 1980 by the Jagannath Mishra government through an ordinance. With it went the much vaunted ten-plus-two education system that the successive Union education ministers have been placing great stress on. The furore that followed was only natural since the implications of this sudden move were loud and clear. Overnight, the 200-odd employees and officers of the council, including its chairman, Shaligram Singh, as well as the teachers and other staff appointed under the BIEC, found themselves jobless. Not only this, more than 150 intermediate colleges became automatically derecognised and over half a million students who had passed the council's examination during the past four years found that their certificates and mark-sheets were now nothing more than worthless bits of paper.

"The Government has disowned the council like an illegitimate child," said BIEC employees union Secretary Jagannath Lal Karn. State Education Minister Uma Pandey, however, showed no regret. "It was the worst experiment in education in the state since independence," she said, pointing out that the council had been the target of criticism ever since its inception. "It failed to fulfil its task and so the Government had no alternative but to abolish it," she added.

What baffled everybody was the manner in which the Government went about it. Said council Vice-Chairman Hiranand Jha, "The best and legal course before the Government was to promulgate an ordinance to dissolve it." The dissolution of the council without proper thought and without alternative arrangements has given rise to many problems which Dubey's two-month-old Government seems unable to face. To the various queries about the future of the employees, teachers and students affected directly by the move, education department Additional Secretary Naveen Kumar could only say that the department was trying to solve all these problems. He told INDIA TODAY that the employees on deputation would be returned to their respective universities while the others would be absorbed in the newly created 'University Service Commission'. The examinations, he said, would be conducted by the various universities as they had been before the setting up of the council.

However, BIEC employees union President Yogeshwar Rai did not think it was as simple as the additional secretary made it out. According to him, the council had 74 employees on deputation, while 35 were direct recruits and nearly 108 on daily wages. While the temporary ones have no place to go, those on deputation too stood to lose their jobs as their earlier posts had in the meantime been filled up. He also pointed out the academic problems that would naturally follow: the implementation of the ten-plus-two education policy, the difference in the council and university syllabi and the future of those whose certificates and mark-sheets had been rendered invalid. Again, he wanted to know what will become of the 150 inter colleges and 28 schools in the state which followed this system.

Students at the BIEC office: out on a limb

BIEC sources alleged the council had all along been an unwanted institution and the Government was only too glad to be rid of it. It had given the council a grant of only Rs 12 lakh in 1980-81, its first year., and Rs 12.76 lakh and Rs 13 lakhs in subsequent years. When Chandrashekhar Singh succeeded Jagannath Mishra, this meagre grant too was withdrawn as an 'austerity measure'. Also, only seven posts of officers, 91 of class three employees and 11 of grade four workers had been sanctioned for the stupendous task of drawing up the syllabus, recognising colleges and holding examinations. The council functioned out of four offices spread over the capital as it had no building of its own.

As a result, the working of the council was inefficient and lackadaisical. Question papers were invariably leaked out and results were often mixed up or kept pending for months on end. The council, which conducted its first examination in 1983, has been plagued with serious irregularities in the appointment of paper setters, moderators and examiners. While the BIEC and the education department kept blaming each other for the mess the council's functioning continued to deteriorate. It was this decay that not only prompted but hastened the state Government's decision to scrap it.

The state has been singularly inconsistent as far as education systems go. In the mid-'50s, the Government had introduced the internal assessment scheme at the matriculation level but when this created vested interests it was done away with. It then introduced the one-plus-three system at the undergraduate level. But this system too was soon scrapped and replaced by the higher secondary system which had the 12th class at the school level, followed by the three-year degree course. This again was partially scrapped when the plus-two system came into effect. However, the eleven-plus-two-plus-two system (matriculation, two years intermediate and two years graduation) continued simultaneously, causing great confusion. The death of the plus-two system was, in a way, expected.

Meanwhile, inter colleges and schools following the plus-two system have proliferated all over the state and the Government's sudden decision to scrap the council has thrown them in limbo. What will come of all this learning and unlearning is anybody's guess.

MORE AUTONOMY

RADICAL changes are likely in the constitution of the boards of public sector companies, following the Government's digesting of the Arjun Sengupta report on the public sector. The Government is likely to push through a decision to sharply reduce the representation of its officials on public sector boards so as to give the companies far greater autonomy and to make them accountable within a framework of clearly defined parameters. The proposal initially met with some resistance from government departments, which argued that since large amounts of public money were being spent by the public sector companies, government nominees should continue to be on the company boards. But Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is believed to have taken a firm stand on the issue and overruled the objections that were raised. A final decision is expected to be announced shortly.

RETHINKING POLICY

A CRITICAL assessment is currently being made of the fertiliser pricing policy, which guarantees fertiliser companies a 12 per cent return on investment if they achieve a stipulated optimum level of capacity utilisation. It is now felt that this does not give companies a sufficient incentive to reduce costs. Also, a study has shown that over half the reasons for low capacity utilisation lie within the ambit of company managements. Going on the premise that the burgeoning subsidy bill can be reduced only by achieving greater efficiency within the industry and by reducing energy consumption in the industry, efforts are now being made to look for more appropriate pricing mechanisms that will subserve these objectives.

CAUSE FOR CONCERN

THE PAPER industry's initial happiness at the Government's decision to allow the import of pulp has now given way to some concern. Paper manufacturers had been looking forward to easier raw material supplies, but they have now realised that the import of pulp makes small scale paper manufacturers a more serious force in the market since they can convert pulp into paper more easily and more economically than if they had to start from the basic raw material. With the paper market already competitive, the prospect of small-scale paper companies providing a new edge to the competition is now being viewed with some concern.

SPURIOUS SPARES

MORE than 40 per cent of the automotive spare parts sold in the country are either substandard or spurious. A recent survey of the market, commissioned by the Automotive Component Manufacturers Association, shows that of the total annual sales of Rs 1,300 crore, Rs 200 crore is accounted for by substandard parts and Rs 350 crore by spurious parts. The manufacturers of both categories of products are able to achieve market penetration by offering larger and more lucrative trade margins, and by evading excise duties and sales tax. The survey suggests that the solution to the problem lies in introducing stricter legislation that will make the manufacture of spurious parts a cognisable offence and also a thorough reviewing of the tax structure that at present gives the makers of spurious parts a cost advantage.

UPHILL TASK

INDIA's overseas debt repayment obligations are expected to increase very rapidly over the next three to four years, before tapering off after the seventh plan period. The figures now available show that repayments will climb from less than Rs 2,000 crore three years ago to over Rs 4,000 crore by 1988-89, before dropping off to less than Rs 1,500 crore a decade from now—unless fresh loans are negotiated with bodies like the International Monetary Fund (IMF). The real crunch on the foreign exchange front, therefore, lies just ahead in the medium-term future, and could develop into a major constraint for the Seventh Five-Year Plan.

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

CHANGING DAILY

SANJAY Dalmia is negotiating with R.K. Karanjia for the purchase of the Bombay tabloid, The Daily. Dalmia, whose family once controlled the Bennet Coleman group of publications, is anxious to get back into the publications business, and the price at which the tabloid (including some property in Bombay and printing machinery) is to be bought has reportedly been settled. The deal has not yet been concluded because discussions are continuing on the question of whether to retain the paper's entire journalistic staff, and whether Karanjia or Dalmia should take on the job of slimming the payroll. If these issues are sorted out to mutual satisfaction, Dalmia intends to convert the struggling tabloid into a broadsheet and to bring out a Delhi edition of the newspaper as well. Meanwhile, an understanding has already been reached with the editor of a prominent Bombay weekly, who will become The Daily's editor if Dalmia eventually does manage to gain control.

DRUGS POLICY

The Elusive Formula

IF ANY drug company were given the opportunity to prescribe remedies for the ailments of its counterparts in the industry, it would probably write out a poison, to be taken in double dosage. And if the Government were given the opportunity to intervene, it would almost certainly be like a dispensing chemist who has forgotten the difference between an antibiotic and a pain-killer.

Both these and more have been in evidence in recent weeks as the Government pulled back from announcing a new drug policy that was supposed to replace the existing one, announced in 1978. Lobbying and counter-lobbying by foreign and wholly Indian-owned companies had reached fever-pitch until the inevitable happened: the Government argued itself to a standstill, and a hapless Minister for Chemicals and Fertiliser, Veerendra Patil, made the astonishing confession in Parliament that he couldn't announce a new policy because of the activities of the rival drug lobbies.

Logically, none of this should have occurred. For two years, a variety of committees had gone into every aspect of the drug industry's working and cobbled together a patchwork of recommendations that were to form the basis of the new policy (INDIA TODAY, October 15, 1984). But with a new government assuming office this year, the competing lobbies thought they spotted the chance to push their own views home and put down their rivals, and began a fresh round of the propaganda war that has so far resulted in a frustrating stalemate.

The first salvo was fired when, in an unusual move, Patil threw open his office to the Organisation of Pharmaceutical Producers of India (OPPI), dominated by foreign-owned companies, which mounted a slickly produced audio-visual show that carried a blunt message: scrap price control on all but a handful of drugs, free licensing, and allow a virtual open-house by replacing government controls with "self-discipline" on the part of the industry. As OPPI President Russi Langrana explained: "The whole philosophy of the Government is changing, and if you want production, you must relax all licensing." That view was echoed by V. Prakash of Hindustan Ciba-Geigy, who argued that "in the earlier environment we couldn't ask for decontrol, but now it is different."

But if the foreign-owned drug companies felt that the time was ripe for the big push towards an open-door policy, they reckoned without the immediate and inevitable counter-pressure from some large Indian-owned companies, who began an equally aggressive campaign to make sure that the Government did not go overboard. The resultant frustration in OPPI circles was expressed by D.G. Shah of Pfizer, who said: "The industry needs a quick decision. Companies are stopping the production of drugs because the existing prices are unattractive, new technology is not being introduced because of the policy restrictions, and production is falling short of the targets. What is the need for further delays when two years of preparatory work has already been done for framing the new policy?"

The answer came from a spokesman of a large, wholly Indian-owned company, who argued that the scrapping of the present drug policy would allow the foreign drug companies to expand into non-essential areas, and prevent the large Indian-owned companies from continuing to follow up on their rapid growth of recent years.

At the heart of the dispute over a new policy are two completely divergent judgements on the results of the present policy. The OPPI points out that drug production in the last five years has fallen well short of the targets set in the sixth plan, that the pace of fresh investment has slackened, that imports are rising fast, that unattractive prices, a restrictive patents law and the curbs on using brand names have prevented companies from introducing the latest drugs from abroad, and that many drug companies are withdrawing vital products from the market because of the unattractive prices.

Hindustan Ciba-Geigy's Prakash argues that his company is losing Rs 4 crore annually on its pharmaceutical business (neutralised by profits earned from its other operations), and Shah of Pfizer points out that numerous drug companies are now seeking alternative avenues of growth, in related chemical fields. He lists Searle, Cyanamid, Hoechst and May and Baker as examples.

While there is some force to these arguments, the rival viewpoint sounds equally convincing. As Harish Chawla, resident director of Cipla argues, that "the existing drug policy has helped the leading Indian drug companies to grow rapidly," that the multinational companies in India have not grown because they chose to stay away from high technology and essential drugs, and that any changes in the patents law or in drug licensing can only strengthen the hands of the multinational companies.

"The philosophy of the Government is changing, and if you want production, you must relax all licensing."

RUSSI LANGRANA, president, OPPI

There is some force to these arguments too. In the five years to 1984, 11 leading multinational drug companies expanded their production of antibiotics by only 5 per cent, while their production of tonics increased by a hefty 50 per cent; numerous foreign drug companies have voluntarily diluted their overseas shareholding to 40 per cent, so that they escape the clutches of the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act (FERA). Subsequently, they have exploited the scheme for registering fresh projects and booked huge additional capacities. Searle India has registered itself for the production of 37 new items in three years, Dupher Interfran for 40 items in just one year, German Remedies for 19 items, and Boehringer-Knoll for 24 different drugs.

"In the earlier environment we couldn't ask for decontrol, but now it is different."

V. PRAKASH
general manager, Hindustan Ciba-Geigy

Allowing foreign-owned companies to expand means a huge outgo in foreign exchange. Such outgo is already rising: by 47 per cent for Glaxo in 1982-83, 50 per cent for May and Baker, 88 per cent for Richardson Hindustan, 70 per cent for Pfizer and 33 per cent for Merck Sharpe and Dohme.

Despite the stipulation in the drug policy that foreign-owned companies must concentrate on the production of bulk drugs, most of them have preferred to focus their efforts on the technologically simple and profitable downstream business of formulations. Thus, in the six years to 1982-83, the foreign companies' production of bulk drugs actually fell, from Rs 63 crore to Rs 55 crore, while their formulation activity expanded rapidly, from Rs 292 crore to Rs 615 crore. In contrast, Indian-owned companies have shown a willingness to manufacture bulk drugs. Bulk production in the Indian-owned sector rose from Rs 87 crore to Rs 270 crore, while formulations grew from Rs 408 crore to Rs 930 crore.

Further, the 1978 policy pronouncement that foreign-owned companies turning out formulations must produce the bulk drugs within two years has mostly been ignored by the companies.

A free hand to the foreign-owned companies will give them free rein to charge exorbitant prices. The case is pointed out of Hoechst Pharmaceuticals charging customers Rs 23,625 per kg of Baralgan Keton, which the company reduced in 1977 to Rs 8,019. The Government, after working out the company's costs, then fixed a price of Rs 1,810. But the drug company took the issue to court, and won its case last December. Critics of the company's record on this issue point out that the verdict was largely on technical and procedural grounds, and that the company has been enjoying substantial profits on this and other drugs.

The broad message is thus clear: allowing the foreign-owned companies free rein will not mean the introduction of new high technology drugs; instead, these companies will move into non-essential areas and charge the prices they want. And national objectives in pharmaceuticals will not be served.

Predictably, the spokesmen of the foreign companies react heatedly to these charges. Arvind Nair of OPPI says: "First the Government does not give us licences to produce basic drugs, then it criticises us for not producing them." He points out that Pfizer wanted to produce the anti-tuberculosis drug Rifampicin, but was denied the capacity it asked for. Similarly, Glaxo wanted to produce Salbutamol, used to treat asthma, but was denied a licence. And numerous other companies were given licences for restricted capacities that made production financially non-viable.

Some of these decisions have certainly cost the country dearly. Rifampicin is now imported in vast quantities at enormous cost: 75 tonnes last year for Rs 16 crore. Similarly, the production of Salbutamol is well short of demand, and 70 per cent of consumption is now met by imports. Clearly, it would have been wise to give Pfizer and Glaxo the licences they wanted.

Meanwhile, R.N. Goel, president of Searle India, argued that his company could not be criticised for registering new projects. "The policy allowed this, and we have made use of it for growth. Many Indian companies have done the same."

Nevertheless, it is also true that most foreign-owned drug companies have chosen not to enter high technology and essential areas in the drug industry, and instead to concentrate on the more profitable, low-priority end of the market. This is the argument deployed by the Indian-owned companies, and Langrani of OPPI conceded its partial validity by saying: "To some extent it is true that the foreign-owned drug companies did not apply for high-technology drug licences." But he adds that this was because of the unattractiveness of the price allowed for these drugs. But that only begs another question: how do Indian-owned companies find the same prices attractive?

In this welter of claims and counter-claims, charges and counter-charges, it is not surprising that the Government has found it impossible to make up its mind on the optimum contours of a new drug policy. The task has been made even more difficult by the active role being played by some influential members of Parliament who have taken up cudgels for one lobby or the other.

In the midst of all this, perhaps the only issue on which the industry agrees is the question of price control. Both competing lobbies argue that the current prices need revision, and that the scope of price control needs to be sharply reduced. The report of the steering committee of the National Drugs and Pharmaceuticals Development Council, submitted last September, argued that the ambit of price control should be reduced from 360 drugs at present to just 90 essential drugs. In its latest round of lobbying, the OPPI has gone a step further and said price control should be restricted to just

"The existing drug policy has helped the leading Indian drug companies to grow rapidly."

20 drugs for such common ailments as tuberculosis and leprosy. And both lobbies have asked for higher price mark-ups than those currently allowed. A proposal to announce higher mark-ups was considered by the Government, but a decision was finally deferred until the rest of the policy on drugs also gets finalised.

This new policy, however, may be a long time in coming. At the consultative committee meeting of the Chemicals and Fertiliser Ministry last month, Veerendra Patil deferred a discussion of the new policy by promising to convene another meeting specifically to debate the issue. But this might well have to wait for the monsoon session of Parliament, after which the Government may need still more time to do its final sums. Most industry observers feel that the new policy is now unlikely to be announced for another six months. And if influential Indian companies insist that there is no need for a new policy at all, and that the existing policy should be persisted with, a final decision may take still longer. Clearly, manufacturing a new drug policy seems more difficult than producing the drugs themselves.

LIQUOR SMUGGLING

Dubious Despatches

THE SMUGGLING of foreign liquor into India has long been big business but equally lucrative, apparently, is the running of ordinary Indian brands of rum, gin and whisky across the state borders within the country. This was discovered by the West Bengal Excise Department when it stumbled upon a massive inter-state liquor smuggling racket recently. The state Excise Commissioner, A.M. Chakrabarti, disclosed last fortnight that "just a few checks conducted on liquor imports from two major distilleries in the state during the last year have revealed that we have lost over a crore rupees in excise duty". Consequently, the Excise Department is checking every import consignment sent out from the two distilleries—Shaw Wallace's Bengal Distilleries at Bhandrakali and Carew's at Asansol—during the past 10 years. All liquor despatches out of the state from the distilleries have been suspended for the present. "What has come out so far is only the tip of the iceberg," Chakrabarti said. Since excise rates vary in each state, the liquor manufacturers have to pay duty to the state where the liquor is consumed. If the inter-state despatches were fictitious, the companies paid excise neither to West Bengal nor the state where the liquor was supposed to have been delivered.

The authorities first sat up last year when, says Chakrabarti, "we found Carew company's own men submitting import indents and insisting on immediate clearance". Acting on a hunch, the Excise Department sent some of the import permits to their counterparts in Bihar and Haryana, from where most of the orders appeared to generate. The documents and signatures were fake.

Excise Inspector Moloy Mitra, deputed to investigate the matter in March 1984, discovered that Messrs Skyland at Motihari in Bihar, who were supposed to have imported 13,746 liquid proof litres (LPL) of liquor from Carew during 1983-84, did not even have a bond licence so the local excise authorities could not have issued any import permit. In Chapra, Mitra found that the local dealer, Prabhu Charan Sahu, who was supposed to have imported 9,636.5 LPL of liquor, had not been issued any import permit. A third fictitious importer, Messrs Wine Traders Bonded Warehouse, located in Sonepat, Haryana, had been despatched 83,463 LPL of liquor. Mitra, in his preliminary report, concluded that there was "prima facie complicity of Messrs Phipson and Company and Messrs Carew and Company". (Phipson is a sister concern of Carew and markets and distributes Carew products.) The investigation, however, received a setback following Mitra's sudden death.

> If the inter-state despatches were fictitious, the companies paid excise neither to West Bengal nor the state where the liquor was supposed to have been delivered.

Shaw Wallace was dragged into the picture when it was discovered that Prabhu Charan Sahu had also been sent six consignments of liquor from the company during 1983-84. Excise officials further discovered that Shaw Wallace had been sending huge consignments to a non-existent Suman Enterprises in Cuttack. According to the Excise Department's estimates, between October 13, 1982 and January 17,1983, it had lost duty worth Rs 33.8 lakh on the consignments. In March this year, the department launched a case against Bengal Distilleries.

The two companies, however, seem to be in the clear. As an official of Phipson explained, "If both the import permits and the verification certificates submitted after delivery of the consignment turn out to be fake, it is not our responsibility." Added Shaw Wallace Vice-president K. Srinivasan: "We cannot be held responsible if someone gives us a counterfeit note. It is the excise official at the distillery who is paid to see that everything is in order." Indeed, according to the prescribed procedure, liquor is issued from a distillery on the production of an import permit granted by the excise authorities of the district where the importer is based. The local excise department's distillery officer then issues an 'export pass' that accompanies the consignment to its destination. Finally, the excise officer of the importing district is supposed to return the export pass along with a certificate of verification.

It is primarily the job of the excise officials to see that everything is in order. "But in this case, we have been left holding the baby," laments the Phipson official, adding that the fake importers have now all disappeared. Chakrabarti, however, feels it is not so simple. "What the companies cannot explain," he says, "is to whom did the company deliver the consignments if the importers did not exist at all?"

BANKING

A Dramatic Turn

STAID central banks are not supposed to send shockwaves through the banking system with hasty announcements and dramatic somersaults. But that is precisely what the Reserve Bank of India (RBI) has done in the last two months by first announcing sharply increased rates of interest on short-term deposits, and then partially retracing its steps seven weeks later.

In the resultant downstream melee, the banks first tried to form a cartel and stick to the old, low interest rates, some among their ranks then broke loose, so everybody was forced to up the ante, numerous bankers forecast dire financial disaster because of the increased cost of money, and pressure was mounted on the RBI to retract, which it finally did late last fortnight.

The banks are naturally relieved. Said the chairman and managing director of a nationalised bank: "If we had been forced to pay 8 per cent interest on deposits of up to a year, large amounts of money would have been shifted from current accounts and savings accounts, and the banks would have been in the red by Rs 150 crore or more."

But the shoe is on the other foot as far as journalist Paran Balakrishnan is concerned. He had invested Rs 12,500 in a short-term deposit just before the RBI changed its mind, hoping to get 8 per cent interest. Now, with the rate of interest more than halved, he does not know whether he will get the old rate or the new one.

The re-revised interest rate structure could also throw a spanner in the works of companies like the public sector behemoth, Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd (BHEL). The company was among the first to take advantage of the higher interest rates on short-term deposits, and within a week of the rates being announced in early April, had deposited Rs 100 crore with various banks, and later added another Rs 15 crore. By last fortnight, the company had netted a handsome Rs 33 lakh as interest. But such fun and games must now end, for the 8 per cent interest rate now applies only to deposits of more than six months.

The initial RBI announcement was clearly conceived in haste, without full thought being given to the downstream consequences. But the RBI did have a certain logic to back its decision. As RBI governor R.N. Malhotra told the chief executives of public sector banks in early April, the RBI wanted to introduce genuine competition in the short-term money market by expanding the interest spread permitted. In the process, it had also hoped to expand the size of the short-term money market, and expected the banks to attract money away from the short-term inter-corporate market.

Bank ads: short-lived splurge

What actually happened, however, was quite unexpected. First, the banks got together under the banner of the Indian Banks Association and refused to raise the interest rates; then, equally unexpectedly, everyone went to the top of the range and offered 8 per cent, led by the two banks that first broke ranks: Bank of America and Bank of Madurai. In between, a flaming row had erupted among the banks, with the nationalised banks accusing their foreign counterparts of playing dirty, and the latter retorting that there was no justification for trying to form a cartel. But with all the banks now paying out 8 per cent because no one wanted a flight of deposits away from their accounts, the financial outlook turned distinctly cloudy. For while on the one hand the borrowing rates had gone up, on the other lending rates had been reduced only a few months earlier, from a maximum of 19 per cent to 17.5 per cent. The Indian banks were handicapped for another reason: with their social banking obligations, their average return on loans is 14 per cent, while the foreign banks earn 17.5 per cent. This puts the latter in a more comfortable situation financially, so that they can afford higher deposit rates, while the Indian banks cannot. So the lobbying for a fresh change of policy began, with the Indian Banks Association writing to the RBI formally on the subject. As a senior banker argued, "The Reserve Bank can't just stand by and watch the banks lose money." With a fresh change of policy coming in short order, that comment proved uncommonly prescient.

The episode had other side-shows too. The more enterprising banks, for instance, tried to attract floating cash by offering compounded interest rates despite the RBI frowning on such innovations; the foreign banks operating in the country began advertising the new interest rates while a government ban on all public sector advertising prevented the big Indian banks from following suit. Eventually, however, the nationalised banks too were able to start advertising campaigns, but within the banks themselves both officers and clerks seemed occasionally to be unaware of the new short-term interest rates. Banks were also searching for ways of simplifying the paperwork involved in renewing 15-day deposits. New Bank of India, for one, was toying with the idea of providing depositors with passbooks in which entries would be made.

That problem has now been solved, but at the end of the entire episode, two lessons seem clear. As Ambi N. Venkateswaran, vice-president and manager of the Bank of America's New Delhi branch, puts it: "The signal from the RBI was that banks have to be more conscious of costs and have to be more productive." The pity is that neither the RBI nor the banks knew very much about how to usher in a new era of competition without botching up the job.

The textile mill: valuable real estate

DCM

Controversial Move

SOME companies lurch from controversy to controversy. For DCM, there was first Swraj Paul's stock-market raid, and then a messy tussle for succession to the top slot. Now a storm is being kicked up over the move to close a textile mill sited on valuable real estate in the capital. Both the Government and most members of Parliament joined hands last month to roundly condemn the company's move to close its 96-year-old mill at Bara Hindu Rao in the heart of the old city. Charges of corruption were aired, and members of Parliament and government officials voiced the suspicion that the company wanted to move the mill from its 63-acre location primarily in order to cash in on the fat sums that commercial redevelopment of the plot would inevitably bring.

DCM's move to close its mill, made public when it informed the mill's 6,109 workers in March that they would be laid off, from July 1, has kicked up dust on two counts: the jobs of the workers, and the green signal given by the Delhi Development Authority (DDA) to the company to put up small multi-storeyed factories and residential flats on the land once it is vacated. Said a Union minister who spoke to INDIA TODAY on the condition of anonymity; "The DDA was wrong in clearing DCM's redevelopment proposal. Obviously, some influence was used."

DCM has promised to take on as many as possible of the mill's workers in a new mill it plans to put up outside the city, but that mill may not come up for the next two years and the more modern plant will not require more than 2,000 workers. The number of those affected by the closure of the old mill could swell to anything over 50,000 if workers' families and small businessmen whose survival is linked with the mill are taken into account.

The inevitable result of all this is that the Government has been brandishing the big stick. Should the company go ahead and down shutters at the mill, the Centre may refuse to license new projects for DCM companies—as a Central minister warned. The Government is also holding out the threat of taking over the mill. The ball was set rolling last fortnight when Delhi Administration Labour Commissioner Nita Bali wrote to DCM asking the firm whether it still intended to close the mill. Bali ended her terse letter to DCM Chairman and Senior Managing Director Bansi Dhar on an ominous note: "Needless to say, in the event of a possibility of a closure, all possible steps will be taken by the Government to prevent the same."

Officials also suggested that the DDA might be asked to revoke its 1983 resolution clearing DCM's proposal to redevelop the mill site. And Union Works and Housing Minister Abdul Ghafoor was setting up a committee to look into how the DDA arrived at its controversial decision, fulfilling a promise he had made to agitated members of Parliament earlier.

The increasingly hard line that the Government has taken on the closure issue has clearly rattled the company. Last fortnight, the DCM board met and asked the company's Managing Director, Vinay Bharat Ram, in whose bailiwick the mill falls, to seek a "graded" solution to the contentious issue. The management now proposes to shift the mill in stages to either Ghaziabad in Uttar Pradesh or Hissar in Haryana, where DCM has both mills and land. And in statements to the press, Vinay Bharat Ram said that the company would help workers who were not absorbed in the new mill to set up weavers' cooperatives.

While that does represent a climb-down of sorts, the company has not gone the whole hog. It has not gone back on its resolve to put up factories and flats at Bara Hindu Rao, which it will sell or lease to find the money for the new mill. Nor has it so far withdrawn a writ petition it filed in the Delhi High Court challenging the Delhi Administration's ruling that the mill cannot be shut "in the public interest." Company insiders believe that DCM's decision to go to court caught some members of the firm's board by surprise. According to them, Vinay Bharat Ram did not consult either the board or Chairman Bansi Dhar on the matter, though strictly speaking he may not have been obliged to do so.

NEVERTHELESS, Vinay Bharat Ram himself was sufficiently alarmed by the flak the company's closure move has attracted to write to Union Labour Minister T. Anjiah on May 12 expressing his dismay about statements made in Parliament by the minister that the Government might consider taking over the mill's management, and about the "baseless and unfounded" charges levelled at the company in Parliament. He pointed out that DCM could not sink money into modernising the mill because it falls into the heavy industry category in Delhi's 1962 master plan, is located in a nonconforming area, and was legally bound to move out by 1982. The Delhi Administration has therefore been repeatedly advising DCM to pull up stakes and move the mill out of the area.

In another letter to Delhi's Lt-Governor M.M.K. Wali, he pointed out that more than half the retrenched workers would receive over Rs 40,000, depending on the number of years they had put in. Those who get less than that would have 20 to 35 years of working life ahead of them. He argued that these workers could find new jobs as the absenteeism figure in mills in a 200-mile radius around Delhi exceeds the DCM mill's labour strength. These arguments would look impressive were it not for the fact that most (though not all) of the compensation DCM is offering its mill workers is legally due to them anyway.

The management has also argued in the letter to Anjiah and in the writ petition that the mill's plant and machinery are obsolete, that the buildings are old and unsafe and that modern machines cannot be installed there. (Vinay Bharat Ram went so far as to claim in a press statement that a Bhopal-type tragedy could occur in the crowded locality since operating the mill there is hazardous.) Demolishing the building and putting up new ones would mean a bill of several crores. Moreover, the mill is overstaffed, with 4.5 workers per loom as against the norm of about 2.5 in profitable mills. As a result of all this, the mill has piled up losses of over Rs 33 crore over the past decade or so. The only solution then is to put up a modern new mill elsewhere—and the Rs 50 crore to Rs 60 crore required for this can only come from developing the Bara Hindu Rao site commercially.

No one can quarrel with the assessment that the mill's machinery is old. But a company spokesman admits that the firm has sunk about Rs 7 crore into new equipment in the last few years. Also, the mill's losses have not been mounting significantly in the last two years and Bansi Dhar has all along argued within the firm's top management that he can pull the mill out of the red given the chance.

The company's case rests heavily on the premise that the Delhi Administration and not the firm, took the initiative to shift the mill, and it presents considerable evidence to suggest this. The story goes back to June 1981 when DCM received a letter from the Administration's directorate of industries pointing out that the mill was in a nonconforming area and inviting it to shift to Narela, an industrial belt 18 miles from the capital. In January 1982, the then DDA vice-chairman V.S. Ailawadi advised the company in a letter that "it appears that the shifting of your unit is inevitable".

In the same month, Delhi Electricity Supply Undertaking Chief Engineer A.S. Pinto informed the Delhi Factory Owners' Association, to which the firm had complained about interruptions in power supply, that it would be in the mill's interests to shift to an industrial area "so that the power supply could be more dependable". Next, DDA's technical committee passed a resolution in February 1983 clearing the company's move to put up factories and flats on the Bara Hindu Rao premises. Subsequently, DCM wrote to the DDA seeking 200 acres of land to shift to, a request that was turned down. Finally, in November 1984 the company's mill land was exempted from the provisions of the Urban Land (Ceiling & Regulation) Act.

That roster looks impressive, but at least one of the mill's labour leaders regards it as a carefully orchestrated sequence of events. Contends Lalit Maken, Congress(I) member of Parliament and general secretary of the Textile Mazdoor Congress: "The whole case was so built up in connivance with DDA officials that it would look as if the only option the management had was closure." That may or may not be true, but it is curious that the company applied for as much as 200 acres of land. DCM argues in its writ petition that 150 acres were to shift the mill to, and the additional 50 acres were meant for future expansion. A company spokesman also says that the present mill premises are overcrowded and the intention was to lay out the buildings and the workers' colonies in a better manner. But a Delhi Administration official points out that at no time was the company seriously questioned as to why it had demanded such a large plot of land.

Meanwhile, the DDA has added a fresh twist to the story. It has claimed in briefings to the Union Works and Housing Ministry that DCM, and not the DDA, made the first overtures for shifting the mill. Adds DDA Vice-chairman Prem Kumar: "We've never insisted on their shifting immediately." That certainly undermines DCM's case, but the DDA could be trying to wriggle off the hook now.

But the DDA cannot get off scot-free. It can be indicted on a number of counts. For instance, why did it permit DCM, a private company, to develop the mill property? Says Prem Kumar, who took charge of the DDA after its 1983 decision on DCM: "The point is, who should do it? Why should a private entrepreneur be allowed to develop land?" There is also the procedural matter of whether the resolution adopted by the DDA's technical committee is valid. Labour Commissioner Bali believes it is not, since it was not subsequently endorsed in writing by the various departments of the Administration involved, though their representatives did verbally concur with the resolution at the committee meeting.

A far more serious question is why the DDA zeroed in on the Bara Hindu Rao mill while overlooking Swatantra Bharat Mills, another DCM mill in the capital. Both are required to move out of the capital under the master plan, as is the company's chemical plant in Delhi. Some regard the plant, which stores some 280 tonnes of chlorine, as far more hazardous to the community than the textile mills, though it has received a clean chit in the past from official bodies. But the Centre is now worried enough by it to have asked the Delhi Administration to set up a four-man committee to assess whether the plant is hazardous or not. Whether it will stay at its present site depends on the committee's report. Lalit Maken, for one, argues that the company's approach is inconsistent: "DCM does not want to shift that far more hazardous factory because it makes huge profits, while it wants to move the mill out."

So DCM plainly is on a sticky wicket. The only broader issue it has going for it is whether firms that in future want to put up more modern and less labour-intensive plants, should be forbidden from closing old and losing establishments solely to protect jobs. The issue seems to have escaped official attention so far. But even if it is taken up, it is hardly likely to affect the immediate outlook for DCM. Its unions may oppose even phased shifting unless houses are first provided at the new site and unless a guarantee is given that no worker is laid off. So the company may well find itself with a new crop of labour problems on its hands.

LOTTERIES

Out of Luck

TWENTY- five- year-old Revathi has been working for a lottery ticket vendor for the last three years, manning a sales stall at a busy Madras thoroughfare. But her normal sense of optimism has given way to gloom: the daily sale tally has unexpectedly dropped from Rs 70 last year to Rs 30. "I don't know how long the stall owner can afford to keep me." Revathi says.

Twenty-nine-year-old Mumtaz Ali has been selling lottery tickets for the last 13 years. But with sales dropping, he has been forced to take up a regular job. "Lotteries are a dying business," he says.

Such examples can be multiplied in Tamil Nadu, traditionally the best bet for lottery organisers. Of the estimated nation-wide lottery ticket sales of Rs 800 crore in 1983, the state accounted for 37 per cent. But sales have suddenly nosedived, and the bulk of the 1.85 lakh vendors of tickets have now been forced to switch to other means of earning money.

A pioneering agency in the city which dealt exclusively in tickets for the Delhi and Uttar Pradesh lotteries and which had a turnover of Rs 6 crore last year has now downed its shutters. Said the agency's proprietor: "We have suspended all our operations, and don't sell tickets any more. We are only running a small office now because we have our agency in Bangalore and need some administrative staff here." Added the managing director of another major lottery agency: "We used to have 700 people on our staff, now we have barely 150. And our monthly turnover has come down from Rs 1 crore to Rs 13 lakh."

Clearly, the once booming lottery business in the state is now on the decline. Adverse publicity regarding the questionable practices of lottery organisers, the repeated postponing of draws, improper and delayed payment of prize money, the introduction of very high-priced tickets (up to Rs 50 and Rs 100) have all contributed to the sudden and unexpected slump in the state that is really the heart of the business. Says M.V.C. Kutty, general manager of a leading lottery agency group in Madras: "All these factors have eroded the ordinary man's faith in the genuineness of lotteries." That point is borne out by Ramachandran, an employee of a state government khadi showroom: "Previously I used to buy five tickets for every Tamil Nadu raffle, and I did this for five years. But I don't think I can waste money like this any more. I only buy one ticket now, and hope for the best."

S.H. VENKATRAMANI

Lottery stall in Madras: no takers

But according to Sugal Chandra Jain, president of the Tamil Nadu Raffle Dealers Association, "the most important contributory factor behind this sudden decline is the imposition of a 20 per cent sales tax on lottery tickets last year. This killed the goose that would have laid the golden eggs. Nobody will buy a lottery ticket if you add on 20 per cent sales tax and a 2.5 per cent surcharge on top of that."

H. Anuraj, the association's joint secretary, seconds this but adds that specific Central Government guidelines on the conduct of the lottery business are habitually flouted. These guidelines relate to the maximum ticket price, the percentage of the take that must be given out in prizes and the minimum margin that the state Government must keep back. Says Anuraj: "The flouting of these guidelines has led to a situation where the common man is gradually becoming indifferent to lotteries."

Several downstream ripples are now being witnessed. The printing of lottery tickets in Tamil Nadu has dropped by an estimated 50 per cent, and the Tamil Nadu Government's profits from the lottery business have dropped from Rs 2.5 crore to Rs 90 lakh. In fact, a couple of months after imposing the 20 per cent sales tax, the state Government responded to the sharply declining sales by absorbing the sales tax burden on its own lottery tickets. Sales picked up after that, but remain much lower than before.

Lottery agencies in the state have taken the sales tax issue to the Supreme Court, which is expected to give its judgement after the summer recess. If the tax is struck down, and if the lottery organisers respond to the new market situation by offering better terms to their clientele, the business might pick up once again. But at the moment, the only agency which has gained so far is the state Government. For despite the dropping revenues from its own lottery, it is raking in fat sums from the tax that is being levied. While officials are tight-lipped about financial details, it is reliably understood that the revenue from the 20 per cent sales tax now adds up to over Rs 8 crore annually on total ticket sales of Rs 40 crore. But when one considers that two years ago monthly sales used to be close to Rs 30 crore, this must be cold comfort. The tax revenue can also be of little use to the 1.85 lakh people who made a living from the lottery business, and who now find that their livelihood is threatened by factors beyond their control.

FICCI

Unseemly Quarrel

THOSE who fail to get their way in committee meetings know that lost ground can be made up by influencing the writing of the minutes. And so it is that the contentious minutes of the meeting called to work out a compromise between the warring factions of the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI) eventually caused the split last fortnight.

A split seemed to have been prevented early last month when a group of senior industrialists met in Bharat Ram's house to work out a solution to the question of bogus membership (INDIA TODAY, May 31). But within a few hours of that, when the minutes were sent around for the signatures of those who had been present, all hopes of a compromise quickly ended. For the Birla-Modi combine that has been accused of enrolling bogus members and thus building up vote-banks refused to sign the minutes. It contended that there was no need for a super-committee to oversee FICCI's functioning and that its members could not be prevented from exercising their right to elect the federation's office-bearers.

The inevitable counterblast came quickly from Bombay in a couple of days, when the incensed members of the Indian Merchants Chamber (IMC) decided that there was no point in continuing to stay in FICCI, and decided to pull out. Said an irate Pratap Bhogilal, president of IMC: "No useful purpose would be served by continuing the association with FICCI." Bhogilal added that "we had little choice. Suggestions were made that we should wait till after the elections to the FICCI committee, but with the clout that the other side commands, they couldn't but have won. And if we left after that, it would have been described as a case of sour grapes."

The unseemly sight of the captains of Indian industry caught up in a market place brawl did none of the protagonists much credit. In one important sense, it was in fact counter-productive. The control of FICCI is important not least for the opportunity it gives individual businessmen to meet government leaders and decision-makers. But the quarrel, in any case, kept the country's top politicians away from the organisation's annual jamboree.

The IMC walk-out, the accompanying resignations by a few other trade associations in the western region, the simultaneous withdrawal of their candidatures by leading industrialists from Bombay who had been contesting the election to the FICCI committee, and the resignation by some sitting members of the committee, quickly overshadowed FICCI's annual session last fortnight. FICCI's leading lights mouthed platitudes about burying the hatchet. The resignations of those who had quit the FICCI committee were not accepted, and a two-man committee was asked to try to persuade and bring the IMC back into the FICCI fold.

However, there was little evidence to suggest that a patch-up was being seriously sought. For one thing, leading members of the rival group were being removed from important posts within FICCI. One FICCI member pointed out, for instance, that former FICCI president Hari Shanker Singhania had been removed from the chairmanship of the Indo-Japan joint business council and made the head of a far less prestigious Indo-Korea joint business council. "Even if his term as head of the Indo-Japan body was over, he could have been given another important post," the member contended. Also, some leading lights of the rival group had been removed from the powerful administrative committee.

A patch-up seemed unlikely for yet another reason: with the Birlas and Modis steadfastly refusing to discuss and sort out the issue of bogus memberships, their rivals have little chance of winning organisational elections in the future. So even senior members like Singhania and Ashok Jain will have to resign themselves to having to play a secondary role in FICCI, or leave.

Finally, the Birlas and Modis have been enrolling new members (their opponents say bogus members) from the south and winning over some existing members by promising them electoral support. As one result, the south withdrew its objection to being passed up for the vice-presidentship this year. Even in the angry west, a breakaway rump is now headed by Shantilal Somaiya.

Clearly, the Birlas and Modis are sitting pretty: they now have total control of the FICCI committee, they have garnered some support in both the south and west, and they dominate the north and east already. It is true that K.N.Modi has been talking the language of compromise and appeasement after earlier saying that those who wanted to leave FICCI were welcome to leave, but industrialists from Bombay charge that he will concede nothing. One western businessman recalled that at the meeting in Bharat Ram's house, Modi declared: "We don't mind if IMC leaves. After all, when IBM and Coca-Cola left India, the loss was theirs, not India's."

The one slight hope of a settlement lies in the hands of newly elected Vice-President R.P. Goenka, who is a born diplomat and who can hardly relish the prospect of heading a truncated body when his turn comes around next year. And with the representatives of large business houses like the Mafatlals, Bajaj, Walchand Hirachand, Kirloskar, Bombay Dyeing and others having expressed their displeasure, the possibility of a mass walk-out cannot be treated lightly. Goenka will be doubly anxious to preserve FICCI's prestige as it nears its diamond jubilee in 1986, when it is also scheduled to host the International Chamber of Commerce. But for the moment at least, the chances of a rapprochement appear exceedingly slim.

CONTRARY to popular belief there is no evidence yet of widespread inflation—the wholesale price index actually dropped marginally last fortnight. Money supply has been relatively tight although bank credit to firms, one of the important constituents of money supply, has loosened up slightly. Foreign exchange reserves were up sharply last month but the trade gap has widened.

ALL DATA are seasonally adjusted. The current trend is completed on the basis of the past six months data to which a regression is fitted.

Wholesale prices declined very slightly last fortnight with most items remarkably steady and non-food articles dropping by 1.4 per cent.

Consumer prices registered an uptrend of 0.4 per cent in March remaining below the long term trend.

Bank credit to firms was up 0.8 per cent last fortnight indicating some loosening up after a very tight fortnight previously.

Money supply has been exceptionally stable last fortnight growing by a mere 0.2 per cent far below the trend rate.

The trade gap rose sharply to Rs 540 crore in February following three months of relatively small deficits.

Foreign exchange reserves registered a sharp jump of 3.7 per cent last month following a decline in the previous month.

The boom in share prices continues unabated with a whopping gain of 6.7 per cent last fortnight with gains in several sectors.

Gold prices slumped by 1.5 per cent last fortnight after steady gains over several weeks, which have propped up the long term trend.

Many happy returns.

When Thai became airborne in 1960, our philosophy was simple. Only the best of people would run the airline. Only the best aircraft would make up the fleet.

And the standard of service would be of the gracious, traditional kind. Thai's Royal Orchid Service took off and hasn't stopped climbing since.

Our pioneering spirit has flourished, too, since we opened up Kathmandu and Bali in the late 1960's.

We were one of the first to establish a special business class.

We introduced the first non-stop flights to Europe. And established a north-west gateway to America.

Served by an ever-expanding fleet of magnificent 747Bs and wide-bodied A300s, Thai's route network now includes over 40 cities in 32 countries across four continents.

Many happy returns, many happy departures.

THE MARKETS

Raging Bulls

THE STOCK-market seems hell-bent on trying to defy the laws of gravity. Despite the Government and the stock exchange authorities doing their best (or worst) to make sure that what has gone up on the market must come down, the rampaging bulls seem about to jump over the moon, while the media laughs to see such fun. The boom on India's stock-markets has now started attracting attention abroad, with the Asian Wall Street Journal calling Bombay the fastest growing market in all of Asia.

Nevertheless, the Government's efforts produced a brief hiccup on the markets last fortnight. The successive imposition of margins on shares, starting with 10 per cent and rising to 25 per cent (in the case of Tata Ordinary on the Delhi Stock Exchange, even 100 per cent) put a brief brake on the resurgent mood of optimism. Also, the unbridled rise in share values—ranging from 25 to 100 per cent in the six weeks since the budget—had made a technical correction inevitable. After all, the bulls on the market would want to cash in on their profits by liquidating some of their purchases. The Government's measures, extreme as they were, almost pushed the bulls against the wall for a while, but they were far from being in a mood for surrender to the market authorities. And before you could say Reliance Textiles, share prices were on the up again.

Chart by B.K SHARMA

Paper company shares were punctuated with purchases and spurts following reports that the Government might end the price control on paper and paper products. But textile and pharmaceutical shares languished and even recorded reverses because the Government delayed announcing favourable policy changes. Tea shares seem destined to begin a slow slide because the increased crop this year could mean a drop in prices and, hence, lower profits. Tata Tea was the exception here last fortnight, following the announcement by the company of an attractive convertible bond issue, and the scrip more than made up the ground it had surrendered earlier because of the absence of a bonus issue. The share's price touched an all-time peak of Rs 112. The TISCO share also progressed on a rally to a new high-point of Rs 638, but rolled back mildly after that.

But how long can the fun and games last? The AICC(I) stress on socialism seems to have gone unnoticed so far; or else the market chooses to dismiss it as being irrelevant to the true direction of economic policy now being charted. But this extreme optimism must yield to some extent, and there should be some nervousness building up in the coming weeks over the fate of the year's monsoons. So the bears might creep out of the shadows in a little while, but there is no sign of them yet.

CHAIRMAN'S SPEECH

DR. CHARAT RAM

THE JAY ENGINEERING WORKS LTD.

HIGHLIGHTS

- A year of record profit.
- Higher dividend; prospects of further improvement.
- Notable progress by the Company's diesel injection unit.
- New project for manufacture of Engine Valves.
- Need of the hour: political/social harmony; improving capital-output ratio nationally; "making investments pay"; most modern international technology for agriculture; cost control nationally.

Friends,

I am happy to welcome you to the Company's forty-eighth annual general meeting.

The directors' report, and the accounts for the year are already with you, and you would have noted that the Company made a record profit ever, last year. The gross profit was over rupees 3 crore against 1.26 crore in the preceding year and about 2.5 crore in the best year before that. The directors have, therefore, proposed to raise the equity dividend from 10 to 15%. It is expected that we may be able to sustain this level of dividend in the years to come, and maybe better it.

Before proceeding to make observations on our operations of the year, I would like to refer to some significant events of the last few months.

The brutal assassination of the late Prime Minister, Shrimati Indira Gandhi, in October last year, was a great national tragedy. Such a catastrophe could have thrown any country into chaos; the test was all the more severe for our country, which is not only the largest democracy in the world but also comprises some highly individualistic components. It is a sign of the maturity of the Indian people, and testimony to our democratic tradition, that we were able to ride the crisis with total calm and equanimity.

The smooth transition of Government to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has earned international acclaim. The credit for this must go, in no small measure, to Shri Rajiv Gandhi, whose hallmarks of sincerity and forthrightness have earned him the confidence of all Indians regardless of caste or creed or political affiliations.

In the parliamentary elections held a few months ago, Shri Rajiv Gandhi led the Congress party to a historic victory. Inspite of having a massive majority in the Parliament, he has followed a policy of harmony and national consensus. The results of the recent elections to the State Assemblies present a picture of stability, blended with democratic diversity. All this augurs well for the political future of our country.

The country is undoubtedly faced with enormous problems, but there is an unprecedented sense of confidence in all social groups of our country — the Government, the business, the labour, the intelligentsia and the people at large. This is vindicated by the proposals presented to the Parliament a few days ago, which show a bold and imaginative approach to all issues of economic development and place a premium on efficiency of management of national enterprises.

I would like to assure Shri Rajiv Gandhi that we, at The SHRIRAM GROUP, would indeed give our best hand to him in the task of achievement of our national, social and economic goals.

Since Jay Engineering is an integral part of the national milieu, I would like to make some observations on a few significant aspects of the national business and social situation:

1. Political and social harmony is vital for the economic progress of any country. The economic progress of Japan is an outstanding model for us. In our country, there have been, unfortunately, symptoms of declining political and social harmony in many spheres. It is critical, for the achievement of the desired momentum of economic activity as well as for ensuring an improved living standard for the people, that the trends of disharmony be arrested and high levels of harmony be developed in political and social spheres. This, in my view, is the foremost task requiring the joint efforts of the Government and the people alike.
2. The country would soon be launching its 7th Five Year Plan with a total expenditure of about 3,20,000 crore rupees; this is double of the expenditure of the 6th Plan, and by any reckoning, it is a very ambitious target. For its effective implementation it will require close monitoring and fine-tuning all along the way.

   Such a vast expenditure has built-in seeds of massive inflation. This phenomenon is more pronounced if output does not grow commensurately with outlay. Regrettably, our capital-output ratio has been worsening progressively; from 3:1 in 1950, the ratio has gone up to 6:1 today. The position now is that it takes twice as much to produce a given level of output than it did at the time of our independence

   We have, therefore, to concentrate on output, more than on outlays, if we want to have growth levels of countries like Japan, South Korea and Taiwan, and at the same time keep prices in check.
3. Some of the factors responsible for high capital-output ratio are, inordinate delays in project approvals, and effectuation of projects and, continuing low capacity utilisation in critical industries. It is imperative that our economic system should provide inbuilt incentives for efficient project management, and optimum capacity utilisation, and penalties for failure, more particularly in key areas like power generation and other capital intensive projects.

4. The immediate area of attention for the Government is to be for achieving an accelerated rate of economic growth for the country. The annual rate of growth of GNP in the last 35 years has been 3.5%. This is inadequate for India by any standard; neutralised by over 2% growth in population, the per capita increase in national income is practically negligible. It is my belief that a stable national income growth rate of 10% per year is achievable within our existing resources of men, materials and money. We have to learn from countries like Japan, South Korea, Taiwan etc., which have all registered growth rates of over 10% for decades, by making their investments pay. I repeat — "By Making Their Investments Pay". This is the key to sustained growth, in a country's economy no less than in corporate enterprises.

5. It is a happy augury that our food production has been going up for some time now. However, the effect of record food production last year must be somewhat clouded by the fact that per capita availability of food actually went down. Clearly, we must avoid being pleased with selective statistics. What is called for, besides of course population control measures, is vastly improved farm management and introduction of most modern international technology in agriculture, so that we can look forward not only to achieving self-sufficiency in agricultural production, but also to becoming a major exporter of foodgrains and other agricultural produce like the United States. We indeed can achieve this with but little financial inputs.

6. Wholesale and consumer prices is another area of dichotomy between statistics and reality. While the public statistics on price situation appear soothing, the actual cost of production of all categories of goods, and household budgets of citizens are escalating at steep rates. Not only does it affect the quality of life of the people, but it also makes export of Indian goods more difficult, and cramps domestic consumption. Our economy is clearly becoming a high cost economy and this trend must be reversed.

I would now like to present to you briefly a resumé of our last year's operations :

FANS

Consumer sale of 'USHA' fans was the highest ever in the history of the Company, and the Company maintained its leadership in the market. While competition in fan business has been getting sharper, USHA was able to maintain its market leadership through continuing emphasis on modern techniques in production and marketing both.

Our Hyderabad and Agra operations showed substantial gains; the Calcutta unit continued to require an out-of-proportion management input.

SEWING MACHINES

Operations of the Sewing Machine Works at Calcutta showed some improvement. This unit however, suffers from the basic malaise of being heavily overstaffed, and worker productivity being incorrigibly low. Management efforts continue to be made to improve the situation, but unfortunately the required response needed from the workforce for turning the tide is not available due to union pressures.

SHRIRAM DIESELS

Shriram Diesels Unit at Hyderabad, producing diesel fuel injection equipment, made notable progress. The unit achieved the highest production and sale since its commencement in 1979. Your directors have sanctioned substantial investment for expanding the production capacities of this unit, and further expansion plans are on the drawing board.

NEW PROJECTS

We have received a letter of intent and approval of technical collaboration for the manufacture of Engine Valves, which is a critical component of all automobile engines, including cars, commercial vehicles, etc. Fuji Valves Company of Japan, which is the largest manufacturer of engine valves in Japan, will provide technical know-how for this project.

GENERAL

You would notice from the balance sheet that lands and buildings of the Company have been revalued, adding about 17 crore rupees to reserves. This will augment our capital base and facilitate raising of funds for our expanding business and for new projects. Proposals for issuing debentures etc. will be placed before you at an appropriate time.

Friends, Jay Engineering is the engineering flagship of the House of Shriram and it holds a pre-eminent position in industry with the nationally and internationally popular 'USHA' and 'SHRIRAM' brands which is quite independent of its relative size and product range. We have succeeded in maintaining a lead in our conventional industries, and are forging ahead in new, high-tech ones. The emerging national scenario offers challenges for those prepared to meet them, and a threat for the laggards. We started out as pioneers and are gearing ourselves so that we shall be counted as pioneers in the new milieu as well.

In closing, I must convey our thanks to the financial institutions, our bankers, business associates, directors, shareholders and all our personnel, from whom we have received complete support.

Statement made by Dr.Charat Ram, Chairman, The Jay Engineering Works Ltd., at the forty-eighth annual general meeting at New Delhi, on March 21, 1985.

This does not purport to be a report of the proceedings of the annual general meeting.

PARLIAMENT

Meaning Business

A HOUSE with a steam-roller Congress(I) majority, a ruling party dominated by greenhorns, a decimated and demoralised Opposition, a young and inexperienced prime minister —the formula seemed perfect for a fiasco. The reality, however, turned out to be very different. As the Lok Sabha adjourned for its summer break last fortnight, the mood was an unusual one: of quiet satisfaction, a rare feeling of a job well done.

Not many sessions in the Lok Sabha's 33 years have been watched with as much interest as the budget session which ended on May 20. Technically, it wasn't the new House's maiden session: the Lok Sabha had met for a fortnight, a mere curtain-raiser, in January. It was the budget session that parliamentarians and politicians were waiting for to test the mettle of the new House.

Interest in the new, eighth Lok Sabha was heightened for several reasons. It wasn't just the overpowering majority of the Congress(I), which for the first time spilt over five of the six wedges that make up the semi-circular Lok Sabha, or the fact that the Opposition came to do battle with its stalwarts missing. For the first time, a majority of the House comprised those who were not in the previous Lok Sabha. Of these 261, a majority were freshers. And the question was whether they would be paralysed by stage fright or whether they would be able to make a meaningful contribution. Rajiv Gandhi's new parliamentary party had film stars, ex-bureaucrats, even a dancer. Would they take well to their new vocation?

There was mystery about the Opposition too. For the first time, the leading opposition party was a regional party. The 30 Telugu Desam MP's were virtually unknown commodities in the Lok Sabha with no known parliamentarian figuring in their ranks. Would they be able to discharge their responsibility of leading the Opposition ? But above all there was curiosity about how Rajiv Gandhi would treat Parliament: would he, like his mother, regard it as a necessary nuisance that had to be put up with or would he, like his grandfather, Nehru, treat it with respect, and fashion it into a powerful instrument of democracy?

The answers came fast and furious through the marathon 68-day session. Parliament has rarely had as constructive a session. More business than normal was conducted in an atmosphere of rare congeniality and seriousness. Not everybody was euphoric and a confrontation between the Opposition and the Government shaped up on some issues, but as Secretary-general of the Lok Sabha secretariat, S.C. Kashyap, said: "This house shows the potential of being the best ever." Kashyap should know: he has worked 32 years in the secretariat and seen all eight Lok Sabhas at close quarters. The Speaker, Balram Jakhar, was even more ecstatic. Buoyed by the manner in which opposition parties set aside their traditional fear of the ruling party and cooperated with the Government on the prevention of terrorism bill, Jakhar was moved to say in his concluding remarks: "I am proud to have presided over this House."

Everybody, it seemed, had reason to look back with satisfaction. Jakhar was happy that cooperation had replaced confrontation so that both decorum and schedule were maintained. Union Minister for Parliamentary Affairs H.K.L. Bhagat was only too pleased to hand out statistics showing the session's good track-record: an unprecedented 102 hours devoted to discussing the demand for grants made by 15 ministries, a record in itself.

The Opposition was pleased that it made an unexpected impact. Said Indrajit Gupta, leader of the CPI parliamentary party: "The Opposition did much better than expected. Our lack of numbers was made up by effectiveness in debate." The Janata Party's Madhu Dandavate, acknowledged as the most outstanding parliamentarian in this House, added: "There was more unity among the Opposition than there has been in the past."

The Government too had reason to be content. In spite of a potentially inflationary budget and numerous flip-flops on Punjab, it emerged virtually unscathed from 48 sittings of the House. And the vigilance and forthrightness of some of its new members came as a bonus. Said Bhagat: "Our MP's showed they were good all-rounders and a very large number of them opened their accounts."

It wasn't hard to see why the House should have worked so harmoniously. Punjab dominated the session and though the Opposition was critical of the Government's handling of it, Rajiv Gandhi met opposition leaders twice to thrash out a consensus on the issue. In other matters too the prime minister took care to carry the Opposition with him on major issues. When the Opposition wanted more time to study the terrorism bill, he readily agreed. Later, the Government even accepted three of Dandavate's amendments to the bill. As Gupta commented: "In all fairness it must be admitted that the Government's majority was not used to stifle debate or to suppress the Opposition's views."

MP's accompany Rajiv into the Central Hall: positive step

With the eclipse of Sanjay Gandhi's boisterous cadre, there was no pre-planned heckling of the Opposition; on the contrary, some of the Congress(I) newcomers impressed even opposition leaders. Admitted Dandavate: "The standard of the debates was better because the newcomers on the treasury benches argued more seriously." Nor were such across-the-fence accolades rare; virtually every fresh Congress(I) MP named Dandavate as the parliamentarian who had impressed them most.

All this does not mean, however, that there was no reason for disquiet and disappointment. As usual, many MP's spent time gossiping in the Central Hall, often missing out the volatile question hour and important debates. Jakhar once found that eight MP's in a row, whose questions were accepted for the question hour, could not be found when their time came. C. Madhav Reddy, 59, leader of the Telugu Desam parliamentary party and one of the few MP's who were members of the first House (he was then in the Socialist Party), admitted quite candidly: "More than half the time there is no quorum in the House but we carry on because of an unspoken understanding that nobody will raise the issue of quorum."

The inexperience of members was sometimes obvious. More than once Jakhar had to remind MP's not to read out their supplementaries as doing that gave the impression that they had been tutored to ask the question. In exasperation, Jakhar once even agreed to hold lessons for new members in parliamentary behaviour after the session ended. Opposition old timers like Charan Singh and Jagjivan Ram were conspicuous by their absence, as also were cine stars Amitabh Bachchan and Sunil Dutt, both of whom are yet to make their maiden speeches.

But these worries took a back seat in the face of the overall optimism. The attitude and performance of Rajiv Gandhi, it was widely felt, was the main reason for the upbeat mood. His frequent consultations with and concessions to the Opposition were not the only departure from his mother's methods: he attended Parliament far oftener, sat through question hour even when his ministries were not listed, intervened several times to elaborate a point that his minister had not made lucidly enough and often just sat and listened to the people's representatives. Said Bali Ram Bhagat, former speaker of the House: "Quite clearly, the prime minister finds attending Parliament a greatly educative experience." Bhagat, Dandavate and virtually every media regular at Parliament noted with satisfaction that Rajiv was consciously trying to emulate his grandfather in his approach to Parliament. But as Kashyap chuckled: "The only difference is that Nehru used to often lose his temper but Rajiv Gandhi has yet to do so."

Congress(I) MP's speak enthusiastically of how Rajiv encourages them to participate. Said K.K. Tewari, the most strident in-House critic of the party who shot into the limelight by his controversial references to the Rashtrapati Bhavan: "The prime minister has told us not once but several times to be vigilant, to even embarrass ministers who don't come prepared. He says this isn't against the party nor will it displease him. In fact, he asks us, 'Since the Opposition is non-existent, whose duty is it to make Parliament interesting?'" The outspokenness of some Congress(I) men has even caused confusion. Lalit Maken, 33-year-old freshman MP who forced the Government to put its foot down on a proposal to let DCM close down its textile unit in Delhi, relates with relish how an opposition MP came up to him and asked if he was with the CPI(M). On learning the truth, the MP exclaimed incredulously: "But how can that be? You are always speaking against the Government." Both Tewari and Maken maintain that they have not been censured by the party bosses.

Rajiv's attempt is to involve more MP's in the business of Parliament in an organised manner. Eduardo Faleiro, the 44-year-old MP from Goa who is now in his third term, says the prime minister has been encouraging his partymen by setting aside two hours every day for them and by restructuring the party's 27 standing committees (attached to each of the 27 ministries) so as to promote participation and specialisation. Similarly, Rajiv is also keen that members of the consultative committees, which comprise both Congress(I) and opposition members, should proffer advice to the ministers rather than grill the latter like they would in Parliament.

Not everybody, of course, believes that Rajiv's performance has been outstanding. Referring to the prime minister's needlessly controversial remark about Calcutta, Saifuddin Chowdhury, a young CPI(M) second-termer coming into prominence, said: "Rajiv Gandhi needs to be more mature." Madhav Reddy felt that he was too indulgent with ministers who were clearly lackadaisical, unlike his grandfather who would never tolerate a minister being casual or arrogant. Sudini Jaipal Reddy, firebrand Janata Party MP from Andhra Pradesh who was an MLA for 17 years, feels that Rajiv still does not have the calibre to deliver major speeches. "In his reply to the debate on the External Affairs Ministry, he was required not merely to refer to our contentions but also to paint on a wide canvas; but his reply was so brief it was little better than an intervention."

Opposition members also felt dissatisfied with the performance of some ministers. At least three ministers, including Finance Minister V.P. Singh, held press conferences on issues they should first have come to Parliament with. Even some partymen could not conceal their disappointment with their own ministers. Noted S. Krishna Kumar, bureaucrat-turned-Congress(I) MP from Kerala: "There are not many ministers who carefully listen to debates."

But perhaps the best thing that has happened to the Congress(I) is the induction of independent-minded elements like Kumar, Maken and Rangarajan Kumaramangalam—all first-timers and far removed from the stereotype dyed-in-the wool, power hungry Congressmen. Some of the new MP's make points that should have been made long ago, as Parliament slid towards irrelevance. Kumar feels that many more brainstorming groups like the existing ones on space and population should be set up so as to study subjects in depth and offer suggestions to the Government. Maken, who admits to being a little disappointed with his colleagues ("I have yet to see a ruling party MP who works hard"), feels that MP's should be given the help of a panel of experts to evaluate the many bills they are required to vote on but which they rarely even read. Kumaramangalam, an exuberant labour lawyer who admits he is "thrilled" by the presence in Parliament of people who would never have taken to politics had Rajiv not persuaded them, feels that every day time should be set apart for a discussion on matters raised in the zero hour.

"We decided we would be a vigorous but dignified opposition....our maximum protest would be a walk out."

MADHU DANDAVATE
MP, Janata Party

Kumaramangalam also feels that an hour is too little for the question time and is quite aghast that a ballot decides which questions will be starred (answered orally on the floor of the House and given more prominence) and which unstarred (answers written out and generally ignored by the media).

But quite clearly the biggest problem that Congress(I) men faced was lack of time and opportunity to speak. With 403 members in a house with a current strength of 513, B.R. Bhagat calculated that with the present convention of giving the Opposition 40 per cent of the time, and with ministers taking up most of the time for the ruling party, less than 75 hours were left in the whole session for the rest of the MP's from the ruling party. Account also for the fact that those who move motions get more time and the average partyman can hope to get no more than five minutes in an entire session. The apathy among Congress(I) men towards the peregrinations of Parliament begins to make sense.

The Opposition, of course, could not complain of lack of time or opportunity. What it needed were replacements for the many heavyweights who had lost in the elections. Admitted Dandavate: "There is no doubt that the absence of able parliamentarians like Vajpayee, Somnath Chatterjee, Era Sezhiyan and Satya Sadhan Chakraborty was keenly felt. Whenever veterans like Vajpayee and Sezhiyan got up to speak, the ruling party and the presiding officers had to take note." But thankfully the Opposition did not let its losses weigh it down. Dandavate and Gupta emerged as its two pilots. In fact, the absence of party stars proved to be a boon for people like Saifuddin Chowdhury. Said the boyish-built Chowdhury: "CPI(M) members Satya Amal Datta, Basudeb Achariya, Satya Gopal Mishra and I were silent last time but now there is no alternative so all of us are taking part."

Confident of itself, accorded respect by the prime minister and not needing to counter the aggressiveness of Sanjay Gandhi's storm-troopers, the Opposition too did not indulge in any of the contemptuous of people like Raj Narain and Mahesh Ram Bagri. Explained Dandavate: "The

Natwar Singh, Vyjayanthimala, and Sunil Dutt: adding a new dimension has to be a difference in our functioning on the streets and in Parliament. We decided we would be a vigorous but dignified Opposition. We would never go into the 'well' of the House (just below the speaker's podium where the secretariat officials sit); our maximum protest would be a walk-out."

Seconding that was Madhav Reddy, leader of the Telugu Desam parliamentary party, who argued: "We have a dozen fellows who can outshout the best. Shouting does not require much talent, does it? But we took a conscious decision not to go in for confrontation." Reddy's defensive and explanatory tone was not without reason. The general assessment, both in the Congress (I) and among other opposition parties, was that the Telugu Desam party had lacked spine and substance.

What was remarkable about the Opposition was the rare unity displayed. Indrajit Gupta explained this "high degree of like-mindedness" as "probably due to the virtual absence of the Bharatiya Janata Party and the Lok Dal with their overtones of communalism and casteism". As a result, said Gupta, the "Opposition showed a more 'leftist' stance in its critique of government policies". But as the session progressed some cracks became evident, notably between the Janata Party and the Telugu Desam. When Madhav Reddy thanked the Union Government for agreeing to abolish the Andhra Pradesh Legislative Council, Jaipal Reddy was quick to point out that there was no reason to thank anybody because the Centre had merely righted its earlier wrong in refusing to abolish the council. Reddy later explained that he had thanked the Government only because of the speed with which it had acted on the state Government's request. Behind Jaipal Reddy's criticism was the feeling that the Telugu Desam was taking after the All-India Anna Dravida Munnetra Kazagham, which is nominally in the Opposition but is an ally of the Congress (I). But Madhav Reddy argues that a wrong perception of his party's decision to be different and pragmatic is responsible for the misunderstanding. As he told INDIA TODAY: "In the past my party was on a confrontation path against the Centre as we had many complaints. So people expected us to oppose for opposition's sake. But now the confrontation is over and relations are normal. Besides, all non-Congress (I) governments are working out their own defence mechanisms. We came determined to be responsible because we have a state government to run."

"More than half the time there is no quorum in the House but we carry on because of an understnding not to raise the issue of quorum."

C. MADHAV REDDY
leader, Telugu Desam

Some Congress (I) MP's still believe that the Opposition continues to oppose for the sake of opposing the Government. Mamata Banerjee, the voluble giant killer from Jadavpur whom Dandavate fondly calls the "light of the house", feels that the 28 MP's of the two communist parties are still recalcitrant. "Whenever I got up to speak, two dozen communist MP's would get up and start shouting," she lamented. Vyjayanthimala Bali, who impressed with her sincerity and desire to learn, shared Banerjee's impatience with the Opposition. As she quipped at one stage when she felt the opposition was needlessly being difficult: "Hain adat se majboor, isliye bolenge zaroor" (Don't blame them; they have a habit of saying contrary things). Outside the House there was a feeling among opposition leaders that the opposition had been too soft with the Government. Janata leader George Fernandes criticised opposition MP's for not putting up a fight against the anti-terrorism bill. There was also the fact that the Opposition had let off the Government on the alarming price rise immediately after the budget.

One issue that threatens to develop into a major bone of contention is the Government's alleged partiality towards the Italian firm, Snam Progetti. Jaipal Reddy raised the issue of Snam's alleged role in the Government's decision to reverse its decision on the Hazira-Bijapur-Jagdishpur pipeline. Unnikrishnan feels that the "Italian connection" is shaping up into the "Achilles' heel" of this government.

Opposition members continued to be unhappy with the attitude of the presiding officers. Dandavate conceded that Jakhar had "grown with the job" but still felt that the chair had not been as sensitive to the Opposition as its status of a "political minority" demanded. Jakhar was visibly agitated at the charge but expressed his helplessness: "Even God cannot please them." He is convinced that the doubts about the speaker's impartiality can only be dispelled if India's political parties adopt the English convention of not contesting against the speaker who, on his part, stands as an independent. Jakhar is keener, however, on other important changes, most notably the introduction of parliamentary committees to examine the ministries' grants. Jakhar sees the committees as the only panacea for a chronic malady: currently, there are nine ministries whose grants have never faced parliamentary scrutiny. The proposal has been in the air for several years but, given the prime minister's desire to make Parliament more effective, the chances of its implementation have never been brighter, says Jakhar. For Jakhar, this welcome development was only the crowning reason for looking back on a session that was intensely satisfying. "We have had a good beginning and it can only get better," he said. The nation's taxpayers, who pay for the parliament's price-tag of Rs 3.5 lakh per day, will raise a toast to that. —AJAY KUMAR

From fibre...to fabric...to fashions...

20 years ago in Coimbatore, the home of textiles ...

..... a 60 TPD plant processed wood pulp into quality fibre. to clothe the nation in a myriad textures and hues. South India Viscose ..... a pioneer in the development of the chemical fibre industry.

Within 20 years ...

South India Viscose has doubled its capacity. Substituted imports to the tune of Rs. 30,000 crores with indigenous fibre. Provided employment opportunities both at the plant site and at the plantations. Promoted welfare activities and schemes at every turn.And acted as a pace-setter for the development of industrial enterprise.

A social commitment ... a ceaseless endeavour

A pledge to preserve the existing environment as best as they can, South India Viscose actively promoted forest development...in the last three years alone they have distributed as many as 3 million saplings. Set up a Rs. 2 crore sophisticated effluent treatment plant, the largest in the country and in South East Asia, to take care of effluent treatment. A polynosic staple fibre plant establishes the Company's continuing endeavour in the field.

And then to a better tomorrow ...

A dynamic management has come into force at South India Viscose. Advanced know-how and carefully chalked out future targets are taking South India Viscose into a new era of progress. An era where quality fibres will spin themselves into quality fabrics ..... and clothe the nation in resplendent colour.

South India Viscose. We give Indian fabric more fibre.

Brilliant Times

Over 15000 Students have enrolled for Brilliant's Courses in 1984 — 85

Understandable. When we adopted the maxim "Every Student a VIP" we knew where we were headed. We revel in being of service to so many, helping them towards a better grasp of the subjects. We are happy when some of them make it at the exams. We are overjoyed when several hit the Top-spots.

STUDENTS PROUD TO BELONG TO BRILLIANT

Judging from the spate of enquiries & rush for enrolment, Brilliant sure has a spell over the student community across the country, spell born of years of genuine record of work.

WISE PARENTS thank Brilliant for the FOUNDATION COURSE FOR IIT-JEE.

There were nearly 3000 enrolments for the Foundation Course for IIT-JEE '86. Enrolment now on for Foundation Course for IIT-JEE '87.

2 year ELITE COURSE for Top-level students for IIT-JEE '86 attracted 980 students of Standard XI. They enjoy 3 Contact Programmes, 3 On-the-Spot tests etc. Enrolment has begun for the 2 year Elite Course for IIT-JEE '87.

MBBS Entrance

It's the same story over & over again. Hundreds of students from Brilliant gain entry to Medical Colleges year after year. Many of them hit Top-positions in the Entrance Tests. Brilliant's Question Bank for MBBS is as popular as ever. Self-Scorers, a bright new feature introduced for '85 exams.

BRILLIANT'S Master-Mind Series

attracted over 500 students in the very first year of our help to MBA Entrance candidates. Now, each day brings in news of call for interview to many of Brilliant's students. Admission open for Master Mind Series '86.

KARUPPANNAN adjudged the Best. It's the unanimous opinion of our students that Brilliant's Ace Professor of Maths Karuppannan is unbeatable as a teacher of the subject.

Brilliant's operations getting computerised. To keep pace with the ever increasing volume of work Brilliant is going in for computerisation of its operations.

BRILLIANT'S EXPANSION PROGRAMMES.

Many new projects by Brilliant are on the anvil. Particular mention may be made of publication of students' aid and career guide books. A new section has been opened in Brilliant's annexe at General Patters Road, off Mount Road.

Brilliant's Contact Programme is getting more & more popular year after year. Brilliant's Flying Faculty are doing almost a year-round job-hopping from city to city trying to answer the needs of thousands of our students.

Brilliant proposes entry into IAS Main too for General Studies & some optional combinations. Announcement of Brilliant's concrete programmes for IAS Main will follow in a few weeks.

Brilliant's Aid for TOEFL

The latest addition is TOEFL coaching programme designed to help ambitious youth desirous of pursuing higher education in the States. 25 papers have been prepared with a special (Optional) cassette for Listening Comprehension.

True, our 60% growth during the last three years is certainly impressive.

But, this performance means so much more to us.

It means that our clients like TELCO, Maruti Udyog, Ashok Leyland, Bajaj Auto, Siemens, Crompton Greaves and others have placed more and more confidence and trust in us.

It means that our strong, resilient ties with our collaborators FAG have yielded excellent results.

It means that the management, staff and workers have strived together in the right team spirit to propel the company even further.

It means that our Rs. 6-crore modernisation cum expansion plan has paid off rich dividends.

It also means that our sophisticated Standard Room equipment for ensuring top quality bearings has made its significant contribution.

But, most of all, our remarkable performance means that a truly great enterprise is on the move.

APPOINTMENTS

Flouted Guidelines

"If the sychophant element amongst the chief justices is not eschewed from consideration, the entire judiciary is doomed."

Justice V.D. Tulzapurkar in the Supreme Court on May 6, 1985

"They (the judges) have also been appointed by someone."

Lok Sabha Speaker Balram Jakhar on May 7, 1985

AFTER a short-lived truce, the simmering confrontation between the judiciary and executive surfaced once again last month. In a scathing attack on what it saw to be arbitrariness in the appointment of chief justices (CJ's) to the country's high courts, a three-member bench of the Supreme Court consisting of V.D. Tulzapurkar, D.A. Desai and A.P. Sen accused the Government of packing the judiciary with "sycophant judges" and violating its professed policy which stipulates guidelines for the appointment and transfer of chief justices in the country.

Referring to the Government's policy, Tulzapurkar remarked: "Junior judges in the high courts were being appointed as chief justices under the policy of having chief justices from outside the state." Added Sen: "The policy of appointing chief justices from outside of their own courts seems to be a pernicious principle."

It wasn't the first time that the Supreme Court had pronounced on the policy of the Government to appoint one-third of the chief justices of high courts from other benches rather than from within the court concerned. In fact, the Supreme Court had in 1982, in a majority judgement, agreed that the Government had the right to transfer judges. But this time round, the court's ire was provoked by arguments that Government was flouting its own guidelines.

The occasion for the salvo from the bench was a writ challenging the transfer of the Chief Justice of the Allahabad High Court, Satish Chandra, in 1983. The writ, filed in the Allahabad High Court in early 1984 by advocate Virendra Singh, alleged that Chandra was shifted in order to benefit some high caste judges who, following Chandra's transfer, were quickly appointed to fill most of the 16 vacancies in the court. The writ questioned this action made on the recommendation of acting chief justice M.N. Shukla.

The high court dismissed the case on the plea that it lay within the powers of the Central Government to transfer any judge to any other high court in the country. Not satisfied, the petitioners took the writ to the Supreme Court in October 1984. Justices D.A. Desai and A.N. Sen admitted the petition and gave the Central Government notice for a reply.

The writ's hearing last month became an opportunity for the three judges to speak their mind. Having criticised the Government for arbitrariness and discrimination in the transfer of chief justices, they also directed the Government to make up its mind once and for all on what policy it intended to follow. Sen specifically asked Attorney General K. Parasaran: "Will you assure us that you don't want judges of a particular kind?" Seen in the context of other remarks from the bench, this was clearly a demand for an assurance that the Government wouldn't resort to manipulation and pack the benches with sychophants.

The bench went on to direct the Government to furnish to the petitioner information detailing:

- the names of acting chief justices in the high courts from which more than one judge had been transferred to another court as chief justice;
- the names of chief justices who would have been transferred had the Government's stated policy been rigorously followed; and
- the names of judges who have actually been superseded with the appointment of their juniors as chief justices in other high courts.

The order was provoked by arguments made before the bench which, accusing the Central Government of being arbitrary in the appointment of high court chief justices, alleged that in some high courts, senior judges had been moved out to clear the way for a junior to act as chief justice or take over as permanent chief justices of their own high courts. Charged prominent Supreme Court advocate Soli Sorabjee: "It is the Government which has breached its own policy for the sake of accommodating some people as chief justices."

Sorabjee was not off the mark. Hardly one in four transfers and appointments of chief justices of high courts has been in accordance with the guidelines since they were adopted in 1983. The decision to adopt the guidelines, which stipulate that all CJ's and one-third of all judges in high courts should be from outside benches, was taken in early 1982 when P. Shiv Shankar was Union law minister.

The policy was, in fact, based on the recommendations of the Law Commison. The Centre's hands were strengnened by the Supreme Court's earlier udgement upholding the Government's uthority to appoint and transfer judges.

Armed with its new policy, the Centre rst used its axe on Chandra and chief justice K.B. Singh of the Patna High Court. ingh was moved to Madras and Chandra o Calcutta. Two months later, in 1983 he Government shifted a relatively unior judge, V. Khalid of the Kerala High Court, to the post of chief justice in Jammu Kashmir whose incumbent, Bahad-din, was sent to Sikkim. Since then, 12 f the 18 chief justices appointed have ome from outside courts. Some of them ave since retired, and at the moment ver half the courts are without outsiders s chief justices.

Ironically, these and other judicial ransfers violated the Government's deailed guidelines, including:

▶ a judge who is to retire within a year hould be appointed chief justice only to is own court if he is eligible for elevation;

▶ the all-India seniority of judges must e taken into account while appointing hief justices from outside the states;

▶ a judge who is to retire within a year ill not be transferred away from his ate.

In actual implementation, these guielines were observed more in the breach. f 12 chief justices transferred or eleated, only four—Chandra, K.B.N. ngh, S.S. Sandhawalia of Punjab and aryana and M.M. Ismail of Madras —were according to the guidelines. Of e others, Khalid had less than a year to when he was moved to Jammu & Kashir. In Patna, by transferring Sandhawa, the Centre effectively blocked the ssibility of promoting Syed Anwar Ali ho was to retire in 10 months and was igible for elevation.

The Supreme Court bench last month so learned of the elevation of T.S. ishra as chief justice in Guwahati alough he was only 58th in the all-India niority list. In Kerala, when Khalid and nother senior judge, Padmanabhan Suamaniam Poti, were transferred, Katli Bhaskaran, only 46th in the seniority t on March 31, 1983, was elevated as ief justice.

Among other violations are:

▶ In December 1983, Mohan Lall imal, a relatively junior judge then 91st the seniority list, was elevated as chief stice in Sikkim superseding 40 judges.

▶ Dambarudhar Pathak, a relatively nior judge, was first elevated as chief stice of his own high court at Guwahati d then moved to head the Orissa High Court superseding 25 senior judges.

▶ Govardhan Lal Jamnalal Oza of Madhya Pradesh, 11th in the seniority list of all-India judges on May 1, 1983, was first made acting chief justice and then confirmed in the same court, superseding five senior judges.

AS IF these weren't enough, the Government was violating its own guidelines by permitting junior judges to act as chief justices in at least 10 high courts for over a year in 1981-82 and again in 1984-85. Nor did the policy change after Rajiv Gandhi took over as prime minister. The three appointments of chief justices since then—to Allahabad, Madhya Pradesh and Jammu & Kashmir—follow the same pattern in violating the guidelines.

The new Government acted true to form once again last fortnight when it confirmed Adarsh Sein, a 51-year-old judge of the Jammu & Kashmir High Court, as chief justice in his own court even though he was 86th on the all-India seniority list and superseded some 50 judges. Nor has the new Government taken steps to fill the vacancies of chief justices in Sikkim, Guwahati, Andhra Pradesh and Punjab and Haryana, all courts which are being looked after by acting chief justices.

The Supreme Court evidently concurs with the widespread belief that all this has been done in order to pack the judiciary with pro-Congress(I) judges. During the hearing, Sen observed that after the retirement of the chief justice in Madhya Pradesh, the next judge in seniority was "kept as the acting chief justice so that he clears all the 10 names recommended for appointment" to the court by the Government. The message was clear: keep a judge in an acting position so that he concurs with the Government's recommendations on appointments to the bench in the hope of getting confirmed himself.

"A loyal judge is not worth his salt. We cannot let the judiciary degenerate as that will undermine the rule of law."

There is circumstantial evidence to back this: in the last 15 months, of the 53 high court judges appointed, no fewer than 32 were made by acting high court chief justices, and 25 of these were in two courts, Allahabad and Madhya Pradesh. The remaining seven were made in Kerala and Jammu & Kashmir. Moreover, as Sen observed, the Government had recommended for appointment to the high court the names of lawyers who had "never appeared" in the high court.

The outburst against the Government has assumed significance with the appointment of P.N. Bhagwati as the next chief justice of the Supreme Court. The outgoing Chief Justice, Y.V. Chandrachud, was always opposed to the transfer of judges from one court to another without the chief justice's prior approval. It was Bhagwati with three other judges who gave a majority judgement on the right of the Government in this regard, clearing the way for what followed.

The views of the bench headed by Tulzapurkar, who ranks next to Bhagwati in seniority, indicate that the judiciary is likely to remain divided on this issue. But since the Government has already made it clear in Parliament that all high courts in the country will be headed by chief justices from outside benches, the court is unlikely to be able to do much.

Central Government spokesmen deny the charge that it is undermining the judiciary. Says Law Minister Asoke Sen: "A loyal judge is not worth his salt. We cannot let the judiciary degenerate as that will undermine the rule of law."

But judicial circles believe that Sen has not been able to carry the rest of the government with him. Sen's junior minister Hans Raj Bhardwaj has played a key role in many appointments, and he has been touring state capitals to discuss potential candidates for elevation to the high courts. With divisions in the Supreme Court and such differences within the Government, the course of events can hardly be smooth. But eventually it will be the nature of the appointments made which will determine whether the judiciary will flounder or flourish.

Gentlemen of the Board.
Are your inefficient boilers or furnaces reflected in your Annual Reports?

... India's Annual Report records a recurring loss of Rs. 270 crores per annum.

Rs. 270 crores is a conservative estimate. They're also today's figures. But with the steady growth in fuel oil demand, tomorrow's recurring loss could be much more. It's a loss that hurts our country. Your company. Your shareholders. And finally your consumers.

Remember, money lost through inefficient or carelessly maintained boilers and furnaces is money you will never see again. Money you were throwing away at the rate of Rs.3000/- per kilo litre. And now, after 16 March, at the rate of Rs. 3,400/-.

The loss through inefficient boilers

Eight primary factors are responsible for the waste of fuel oil in boilers.
1. Storage, handling and preparation
2. Draft control 3. Loading
4. Utilisation and distribution of steam 5. Condensate & Flash Steam recovery 6. The flue gas exit temperature 7. Tuning and maintenance 8. And finally, replacement of old and inefficient boilers.

The loss through inefficient furnaces

The six areas or factors are often similar to that of boilers.
1. Storage, handling and preparation 2. Burner alignment 3. Draft control 4. High flue gas exit temperature 5. Heat recovery from flue gases 6. Under utilisation of furnace capacity.

PCRA helps a boiler user save 5377 Kilo litres of fuel oil.

After 16 March, this works out to a recurring saving of Rs.182 lakhs. This was possible when Hindustan Anti Biotics Ltd. agreed to implement 4 recommendations from PCRA.
1. Lagging of hot water and condensate tanks
2. Condensate recovery
3. Prevention of steam leakage and waste heat recovery
4. Basic Housekeeping measures.

Note :The OIDB offers industrialists long term low interest loans to switch to more efficient boilers.

PCRA helps an industrial unit save Rs.45 lakhs per annum.

The JG Glass Industries Ltd. utilises furnaces to produce glass. PCRA made 3 recommendations :
1. Better maintenance
2. Better capacity utilisation
3. Redesigning a furnace.

The results? The glass draw increased from 60 tonnes per day to 84.8 tonnes. LPG consumption came down from 58.3 Kg/tonne of glass to 33.61 Kg/tonne. Oil consumption came down from 161.3 Kg/tonne of glass to 137.9.

The annual saving (which is recurring) amounts to a staggering Rs.20 lakhs in furnace oil and Rs.25 lakhs in LPG.

Call PCRA today for our "Free Services"

PCRA can help you save 10 to 20% of your fuel bills incurred by inefficient boilers and furnaces. We have 3 corrective programmes. Short term, mid term and long term. PCRA also offers technical services to help you implement these solutions in all three phases. If necessary we also call on independent specialists at our own cost.

Over the years PCRA has also developed energy efficient devices for you. A well known example is Burners. To date, 650 of these Burners are in use in Indian industry. If you are not using one, get in touch with us today.

Conservation pays for itself. And then gives you a profit

Remember, in energy efficiency programmes "change" pays for itself immediately. A new, efficient two tonne boiler, for instance, will pay for itself in less than two years. And from then on, the recurring annual saving is pure profit.

Your colleagues realised this. They took PCRA's advice and asked for PCRA's "free services". And, now they have a message for you: "Conservation is profitable. Join us".

That's the message from 1299 industrialists. Why don't you get in touch with us today and make it a round figure.

PCRA is a Government sponsored organisation and a representative of India's petroleum companies in areas related to conservation. PCRA's four major conservation targets are the Industrial, Agricultural, Domestic and Transport sectors.

PCRA's services are free. Savings achieved by PCRA through conservation exceed Rs.100 crores per annum.

POWER GENERATION

Building up Energy

THE IDEA came at a time when everything from sea tides to garbage, was being investigated to find fuels of the future. But unlike most of the research organised in the wake of the oil crisis of the early 1970s, this wasn't a search for a new fuel. On the contrary, when the scientists of the Bhabha Atomic Research Centre (BARC) in Bombay and Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd (BHEL) in Tiruchi last fortnight successfully completed 'Operation Plasma' after seven years of research, they were reaching back to principles known to every school student of physics: Faraday's law of magnetic induction first enunciated in 1831. Their goal: to find a new, more efficient way of converting coal into electricity.

The joint BARC-BHEL research project, based on a Rs 15-crore pilot plant designed to produce 5 mw of power in Tiruchi in Tamil Nadu, based itself on a sophisticated technology known as magneto hydrodynamics (MHD) which the Soviet Union has been experimenting with since 1964. According to these laws of physics, when a conductor or material is heated to a very high temperature, it gets ionised (converted into electrically charged particles) and creates a 'plasma' or gas in which the number of positive ions and electrons are about equal. When this plasma or electrically charged gas moves at a high velocity across a magnetic field, it gives rise to an electromotive force—or electricity.

In the Tiruchi pilot plant, blue water gas was burnt in oxygen enriched air at 2,700 degrees Celsius under high pressure equal to five times the normal atmospheric pressure. A small quantity of potassium carbonate, which ionises easily, was added to make it a more efficient conductor of electricity, and the resulting plasma was fired through a flaring tube at about 1,000 metres per second. The targeted temperature and conductivity was reached, making Operation Plasma a success. In the second and final phase an electro-magnet will help produce direct current that will be converted into alternating current with the help of an inverter. This is expected to be accomplished by September, after which coal will be introduced as the fuel for combustion. As BHEL specialist S.A. Arunachalam put it: "The MHD generators are like a rocket motor tied to a spot. But instead of generating thrust like a rocket, it generates power."

Operation Plasma has elated the Tiruchi team. A young engineer working on the project said it gave the lie to the sceptics who said that the plant would not be commissioned. Said he: "The plasma was generated the very first time we switched it on. We expected problems but surprisingly, the first run was smooth." MHD project chief and Director of Reactor Research at BARC P.R.Dastidar declared: "The technology has been developed sufficiently to generate the first unit of power by September at the latest," adding that there was still a long way to go. Heartening though it is, the Tiruchi plant is actually running three years behind schedule. To some extent this is due to red tape and the usual bureaucratic delays associated with tendering processes. As Dastidar admits: "The delays are a common phenomenon in a research project of this complexity." The problem, he says, was accentuated by the need to import ceramics and refractory materials.

The MHD plant at Tiruchi: a dream no more

In spite of that, it is successful, and as BHEL's senior executive at the project, S. Sridharan, said: "The pilot plant is totally indigenous in manufacture and to a considerable extent in design." BARC was responsible for the scientific aspects including the supply of a massive, 300 tonne electro-magnet, the power channel in which the plasma is generated and the complex instrumentation associated with the experiment. BHEL chipped in with components such as the main combustor or vessel in which the fuel was ionised, the sophisticated high temperature valves and various other components of the project, not least the experience available at its Tiruchi unit.

The effort is being vigorously pursued because the MHD route for generating electricity from coal offers several advantages. It is almost 33 per cent more efficient than conventional generating plants and though the capital cost is higher, the ultimate unit cost of electricity is lower. The technology is such that it uses up less water, leading to all-round conservation of natural resources.

India isn't the only country going ahead with this research. The Tiruchi project puts the country in the select company of those on the front line in this field. The Soviets apart, this includes the US, Japan and China though they haven't gone in for an experimental MHD power station like the one at Tiruchi. Britain gave up its research years ago in the belief that nuclear power offered better hope. The Soviet Union is the farthest ahead, having generated continuous power for 260 hours from an experimental 25 mw natural gas facility. They hope to have a commercial 500 mw plant next year.

India intends to go ahead with the Tiruchi experimental project seriously and hopes to graduate to a commercial plant in the future. Says Dastidar: "This is a far cry, but with some minor break-throughs in materials technology to develop high temperature-resistant refractories it should be possible to scale up operations." The route to clean coal-based technology may still be distant, but it is at least no more a wistful dream.

GURUVAYOOR

Trouble in the Temple

KERALA Chief Minister K. Karunakaran's favourite deity is Lord Krishna at Guruvayoor, and he makes it a point to visit the temple on the first day of every month of the Malayalam calendar. But in the process he has also got the temple embroiled in more controversies than is seemly for a place of worship. Only last year the withdrawal of temple funds from the private Dhanalakshmi Bank (INDIA TODAY, August 31, 1984) at Karunakaran's instigation caused an uproar when it was discovered that the chief minister was out to spite the bank's chairman, H. Iyer, over the dismissal of some Congress(I) men from his staff. Later, in a bid to thwart the opposition CPI(M)'s bid to put its men on the Travancore and Cochin dewaswom (temple management) boards he succeeded in pushing through an ordinance that made it compulsory for all members, including atheists, to profess faith in "God" before the voting to these temple boards.

But the latest scandal to hit Guruvayoor puts everything in the past into the shade. This time the mismanagement of the board took on a more unsavoury hue when it was discovered that some gold ornaments for use on the idol and stored in the sanctum sanctorum were missing. The temple board only compounded matters by initially trying to hush up the affair, but confessing later that they had known about the missing ornaments when the previous melsanthi (chief priest) relinquished his post (every chief priest is appointed for a period of six months). At the time of his departure, the head priest K. Damodaran Namboodri admitted his "carelessness" in mixing up the ornaments with used garlands and flowers adorning the idol and readily agreed to pay up the Rs 50,000 the missing jewellery was assessed for by the temple authorities.

The temple authorities may have thought the matter was happily closed. But a week later newspaper reports appeared about the missing jewels and the public outcry knew no bounds. Prominent Hindu leader of Kerala, Kerala Verma Raja, grumbled: "The fact that not one but three necklaces were missing, that the police were not informed and that the value of the jewels was arbitrarily fixed at Rs 50,000, should open the eyes of the public to the defilement and desecration of the holy atmosphere of Guruvayoor temple." Karunakaran was left with no choice but to entrust the case to the state crime branch.

SUMAN DUBEY

The entrance to the temple: a case of missing ornaments

The nine-member Guruvayoor Dewaswom has six members nominated by the Government, including the Chairman, P.T. Mohankrishnan of the Congress(I). Says Vishwa Hindu Parishad state Secretary K. Rajashekaran: "The situation at Guruvayoor is alarming. A set of politicians is running the show, which has resulted in all sorts of irregularities."

The recent happenings in the temple have also given the Hindu Front in Kerala a new opportunity to press for the implementation of the Sankaran Nair report of 1984. Nair had stressed in that report that temples in the state should be administered by Hindu organisations and not by nominees of political parties. And this campaign for the reform of temple administration is not a new thing. For the past few months it has figured on and off in the state Assembly. Says Kerala Verma Raja: "If Karunakaran is sincere about protecting Hindu rights, he should ask his cohorts to resign from the Guruvayoor temple management board and give it to Hindu organisations."

Against this background, it is not surprising that many people in the state believe that the affairs of Guruvayoor temple have reached new lows as controversies continue to build up. There is one thing, however, that the temple management board does not lack, and that is money. A few months ago it used up Rs 15 lakh of its cache to produce a full length feature film Guruvayur Mahatmyom. The film was not a success. Interestingly, Mohankrishnan has a major role in the film. So does his wife. Said an angry Rajashekaran: "Producing films at devotees' expense and then having the chairman of the dewaswom and his wife in it is the most sacrilegious incident in the history of the temple." But Mohankrishnan says: "If we had signed top stars it would have been expensive, so to cut down the production cost I decided to act in it. As for my wife she appears in only one scene."

Mohankrishnan pooh-poohed the idea of the temple being handed over to Hindu organisations. "I may be a Congress(I) man, but I am a Hindu as much as the so-called Hindu leaders." But Rajashekaran, who recently took part in the mass prayers conducted under the auspices of the Hindu Front in the Guruvayoor temple, says: "We will not rest until we cleanse the temple of unholy politicians." In the coming weeks the Hindu Front plans demonstrations to "arouse the Hindu conscience" against the irregularities in the management of temple affairs. For the Kerala Government, Guruvayoor remains a place where the mixture of the sacred and the profane has obviously not worked out too successfully.

NEORA VALLEY

Out of the Woods

RISING from the north Bengal Dooars to a height of over 7,000 feet in the eastern Himalayas is a little-known valley called Neora. Untrodden for the most part by humans, this valley has for the past four years been the subject of a controversy over the West Bengal Government's plans for setting up a Rs 22-crore drinking water project in its upper reaches. Last fortnight, however, when the Government revealed its final plans, duly approved by the Central Environment Department, even the most strident critics of the project fell silent. For, as the state Public Health Engineering Department (PHED) chief, D. Dasgupta, puts it: "This is the first time that a development project has been designed to preserve the environment rather than destroy it."

Map by B.K. SHARMA

The situation, however, had not been so reassuring in 1980, when environmentalists first got wind of the project. The valley, ecologists pointed out, was a "gene pool reserve" where evolution had progressed without interference and contained a veritable treasure-house of endangered plants and animals. An expedition to the Neora valley in 1982, sponsored by the Himalayan Club and the World Wildlife Fund, sighted the rare clouded leopard, the lesser panda and musk deer, besides spotting numerous unclassified species of plants and an incredible 2,000-odd varieties of orchids. The Neora valley also contains the only surviving forest in the entire 2,500 km length of the Himalayas where different types of vegetation covering an altitude range of 100 to 3,500 metres exist.

The late prime minister Indira Gandhi's intervention in December 1980 stalled the project and the Government was asked to prepare an alternative scheme in the area since both Kalimpong town and its adjoining army cantonments faced an acute shortage of drinking water. The Neora Valley Project was designed to supply 1.5 million gallons of water per day as against the existing supply of only 0.4 million gallons. Curiously, the Government took almost two-and-a-half years to submit a detailed alternative scheme for pumping water to Kalimpong from the Teesta.

By then even the West Bengal Environment Department had realised that the Neora project, as it was envisaged, would adversely affect the valley's ecology. According to a report prepared by the Forest Survey of India, the valley had "survived depredation so far on account of its inaccessibility, but with the extension of roads to its fringes by the West Bengal Forest Development Corporation, which has plans to clearfell the forest for conversion to an exotic monoculture plantation, this distinctive ecological niche is already gravely imperilled". Moreover, the Central Environment Department felt that the construction of a pipeline with a service road following the entire length of the densest forest segment would "result in degradation of a largely intact ecosystem".

The alternative scheme for pumping water up 4,000 ft from the Teesta river to Kalimpong, however, proved to be unfeasible. The state Environment Secretary, K.C. Sivaramakrishnan, pointed out that the heavy-duty pumps, diesel generators, access roads and high-pressure pipes required for the Teesta alternative would be far more disastrous ecologically than the Neora valley scheme. Apart from deforestation, the Teesta scheme would cause atmospheric pollution and create the risk of major landslides.

With the army clamouring for water, the Government perforce had to fall back on the Neora project. Judging from the modifications made in the PHED's final plans, the environmentalists have apparently made their point.

To begin with, the Government accepted the Central Environment Secretary T.N. Khoshoo's logic that clearfelling of virgin forests in the valley area would not only destroy the precious soil cover of the unstable mountainsides, but would also result in the drying up of the existing perennial water source. Khoshoo suggested that the practice of converting forests into timber plantations after clearfelling could be disallowed under the provisions of the Forest (Conservation) Act, 1980, which stipulates that Central clearance is required for utilising any forest for non-forest purposes, including timber plantations. The West Bengal Forest Development Corporation was initially disallowed from carrying out forestry operations in the 38 sq km project catchment area in the upper part of the valley, though it had already converted 40 sq km of the total 116 sq km area of the valley into monoculture plantations. Later it was decided that the all the intact forests in the valley would be protected and a buffer zone created around it to prevent encroachment.

Fears of the lower reaches of the valley dying out due to the withdrawal of all water from its upper reaches during the lean summer months were also dispelled by the PHED. The Centre was informed that only two streams in the valley—Neora Khola and Dhaula Khola—would be tapped in the upper reaches by constructing weirs. Says Dasgupta: "No part of the valley will therefore be submerged and all excess water will flow over the weirs."

Moreover, instead of constructing 38 km of roads through densely forested portions of the valley as originally envisaged, only 14 km will be constructed. "We will either demolish or permanently close this road after the project is completed," says Dasgupta.

To ensure that the PHED sticks to the approved plans, a special committee has been set up. Efforts are also being made to declare Neora valley a national park which will be guarded by army personnel. If all of what the environmentalists have been demanding comes about, Neora valley could well be a paradigm for future development projects in the country's remaining virgin reserves.

JAIPUR

Ancient Images

THE IMAGES are familiar but it takes the eye a little while to comprehend them. Here is the Taj Mahal looking much as it does today though the trees seem bushier and more plentiful. Jaipur's famed Hawa Mahal looms loftily over a deserted street rather than the busy thoroughfare that skirts it today, and Delhi's Jama Masjid with a—now unbelievable—expanse of space in front of it. The portraits are forbidding, the expressions suitably remote. But that is only to be expected: the collection of photographs on display at Jaipur's Maharaja Sawai Man Singh II Museum were taken a hundred years or more ago. What is more, they are the handiwork of India's first "photographer prince", Ram Singh. Not only do they bring Jaipur and its royal family of the mid-19th century vividly to life, they are obviously a privileged glimpse into a royal way of life.

The exhibition includes Ram Singh's camera (bought in 1864 for Rs 250, it is recorded) complete with a set of diaphragms and lenses, dark-room equipment, an ancient camera stand, albums, negatives, prints and the prince's personal diary.

If the photographs—only some 400 items of a total of 10,000 prints and negatives located—are amazing, no less is the story of their find in 1978. The museum's keeper, Yaduendra Sahai, 44, who has been with the institution since he was 20, says that his curiosity was aroused by Louis Rousselet's 100-year-old book

India and Its Native Princes. Describing his experiences in 1864 in it, Rousselet, himself a keen photographer, writes in the context of Ram Singh: "The conversation then turns on photography (he is not only an admirer of the art, he is himself a skilful photographer)."

Till then, says Sahai, he had heard that there had been a raja who was a keen photographer, but here was a definite pointer to his identity. Sahai started out by talking to the city palace's 40 full-time farashs (dusters) whose job is, literally, to prevent dust from settling on the exhibits and the uncounted treasures wrapped up and stored in its vaults and rooms. None of them could recall having seen anything relating to photography. But one of them did say there were several boxes lying in what used to be Ram Singh's chambers. These boxes, he said, had been dusted daily for half a century but never opened.

The museum which was set up in 1959 has slowly been sifting through tonne upon tonne of relics accumulated by the Jaipur royal family over the centuries. Discoveries in these collections have fundamentally altered contemporary understanding of some schools of miniature painting, for example. The discovery of some 3,000 negatives in 1978 and around 7,000 prints three years later (the project was halted because Sahai was ill for over three years) proved to be another gold mine. Sahai believes that there is still more—he suspects that over the years some of these photographic treasures have found their way to private hands.

Ram Singh, who ascended the throne at the age of 17 months in 1835 on his father's death, grew up to marry nine women, three of whom were daughters of the Maharaja of Jodhpur. He had other interests as well, ranging from music to archery, from horse riding to crochet to collecting watches to cricket. Of these many interests photography was one that

NGEF Brushless Alternators.
The perfect match for your diesel engines.

Incorporating superior AEG-TELEFUNKEN technology

Minimise maintenance downtime, maximise production by insisting upon NGEF Brushless Alternators. The ideal match for your diesel engines.

NGEF Brushless Alternators are manufactured in collaboration with AEG-TELEFUNKEN, West Germany. Their advanced design eliminates sliprings and carbon brushes, thus practically eliminating maintenance downtime.

With the use of the electronic voltage regulator, NGEF Brushless Alternators guarantee a steady state voltage regulation of ±0.5% as against ± 2% normally offered by other manufacturers. Due to quick voltage response, starting of motors is smooth and stalling is eliminated. The Gensets can be operated in parallel and/or connected to grid.

Get wise to the powerful qualities of reliable performance. Insist upon NGEF Brushless Alternators.

Countrywide network offers excellent after-sales service.

Range of Manufacture:
8 kVA to 1640 kVA in 415 Volts and 500 kVA to 1000 kVA in 3300 Volts and 6600 Volts at 1500 rpm for 50 Hz and 1800 rpm for 60 Hz.

clearly obsessed him. Apart from clicking himself, he was a collector too. And one day, rifling through several pictures taken mostly at official dos, he decided to try his hand with the camera himself. Sahai estimates that about a thousand of the photographs recovered were taken by Ram Singh himself, and a substantial number were those of his official photographer, T. Murray.

A major find was related to Lala Deen Dayal of Indore—and later Raja Deen Dayal—who finally became official photographer to the Nizam of Hyderabad and was perhaps the best-known Indian photographer of his time. Ram Singh had commissioned Deen Dayal in 1876 to capture Jaipur in frames but Deen Dayal completed his assignment only in 1888, eight years after Ram Singh's death. Forty copies of his album, each with 30 views of Jaipur city, are among the items that have been located. What is important, these do not figure in any of Deen Dayal's works known so far.

Shooting wasn't so simple then. The night before, glass plates had to be painted—on one face—with fish glue and wet collodion which made them light sensitive. The following morning, after they had dried, they were loaded in the camera. Developing and fixing was done in tanks and printing and washing which took hours was achieved by placing paper and negative in the sun. To keep track of time, photographers apparently recited different Sanskrit shlokas for different operations. One of the recently found magnifying lenses is nearly a foot in diameter.

Says the museum's director for 13 years, Asok Kumar Das, 47, author of half a dozen books on Mughal art: "The most important set undoubtedly is the one of women from the zenana. There are very few photographs available of these ladies of this period anywhere in India. It gives us a very good idea of the costumes and jewellery of that period." Das feels that the photographs of Jaipur also provide interesting documentation and serves as a base to compare the city's growth since. Says Das: "The bungalow allotted to T. Murray is today with the chief justice of Rajasthan. That gives an adequate indication of the importance that Ram Singh attached to the subject."

A lot more clearly remains to be done in terms of classifying and documenting the thousands of negatives and prints. But what is remarkable about the exhibition at a time when literally crores are spent on cultural extravaganzas, is that the show was put up at the cost of only a few thousand rupees. Perhaps there is a lesson in that for someone too.

Garewal: limited audience

◆ It's a woman's world. Well, not quite. The razzle-dazzle Sunday morning TV programme of that name hosted by glamorous sophisticate Simi Garewal is heading for more of a split than model Shyamolie Verma can perform in her aerobic offering on the programme. The reason: increasing criticism on the frivolousness of the format. "I'll never satisfy women," stormed Simi who has threatened to quit the show, "they'll always be picking on something or the other." Obviously, the "real woman" at whom the show is directed has other things to do on Sunday mornings.

◆ When Papa Babasaheb Bhosale was chief minister three years back, his son Rajan cut his first disc for HMV, Dharkan Dil Ki with Lata Mangeshkar's sister Meena composing the lyrics. Guitar-strumming Rajan seemed all set for a career in music, but Bhosale insisted that his son's medical studies should come first. Papa obviously knew best. Last fortnight Rajan, 26, was awarded a first class first in his MD in radiology on the very day he was wedded to his singing companion of numerous TV and stage shows, Minu Bajaj. The two music-lovers met five years back as classical music students of the same guru and found they harmonised so well together they decided to make it a permanent duet.

◆ It was a fortnight for Indian prime ministers, past and present. First, Rajiv Gandhi returned from his first official tour abroad as prime minister just in time for the 21st death anniversary of his grandfather, Jawaharlal Nehru. Then, a day later, 1 Safdarjung Road, the former residence of his late mother, Indira Gandhi was thrown open to the public as a state memorial. It was a moment that brought back memories both triumphant and tragic but nothing was as poignant as the glass-enclosed and blood-encrusted spot where she fell to assassins' bullets on one of the darkest days in Indian history.

The newly wedded couple: love song

◆ It's a question of mind over matter even if the matter does happen to come in a 34-23-35-sized package. "She won because of her confidence and witty replies," said Femina Editor Vimla Patil referring to the latest holder of the Miss India title, Sonia Vallia, 21, a 5 ft 8 inch model from Chandigarh. Last fortnight's beauty contest, sponsored by Femina and DCM Silk Mills, proved that looking good is not enough — little grey matter would also do very well, thank you.

Vallia: beauty with brains

Sonu, as she prefers to call herself, fits the bill quite adequately with a B.A. degree and a journalism diploma behind her and a string of prestigious modelling assignments ahead. But the pot of gold at the end of the catwalk—apart from the Rs 11,001 and a trip to Miami that accompanies the title—is, ho-hum, a career in films. Move over Zeenie Baby.

WRONG PRIORITIES

Your cover story ("Passage to the West", June 15) gives a comprehensive report of the two festivals being organised at a huge cost to the nation. I hope India is able to reap a rich harvest in trade and international relations by this novel idea of diplomacy through festivals.

The time chosen for the festivals does not seem to be very appropriate. There is problem in Punjab and the national integration seems threatened. Our Neros were preparing for the Asiad and the NAM when there was trouble brewing in Assam and Punjab. And now at a time when the states of Punjab and Gujarat need immediate attention they are busy with the festivals at Paris and Washington.

New Delhi V.N. SOOD

■ I don't understand why we have to go abroad to show our art and culture. Will we get any return on the investment on these festivals? We should organise these festivals in India itself and not risk carrying our sculptures and valuables abroad. What happens if any of these precious items are lost, will the insurance money recover the loss? Why don't other countries have similar festivals in India? Will we ever be able to see the Mona Lisa sitting in our country? The Festival of India, London was a failure in economic terms. Wasn't that a lesson enough?

Falna, Rajasthan SANJEEV KUMAR DEV

LAW AND JUSTICE

After reading your biased (in favour of the criminals) Comment "Embittered Minds" (June 15) I feel that editorials like yours make even potential criminals active. The basic requirement of "Law and Justice" through the proper, unhindered functioning of the police (or the army if the need arises) is to protect the law-abiding citizens from the depredation of the not-so-law-abiding ments of society—be they thieves, ists, arsonists or murderers. Only the "an eye for an eye, and a to tooth", as it is practised with 100 per success in the Middle East, can curb eventually stop all crimes. If the abiding citizens are to be protected the criminals, the latter have to be ished instead of being given VIP treatm a la your advice. Editorial responsib does not lie in trying to make the abiding citizens meek and subservien the criminals.

Bombay K.N.N

NEED FOR ACTION

Your cover story "The Return of rorism" (May 31) was revealing. recent bomb blasts warn that terroris still very much active and can raise ugly head at any time and any place. rorism needs to be dealt with an hand. The Government should not time in finding out the root cause of tragedy. Merely treating the sympto won't settle the issue permanently.

In the "anatomy of a bomb" it is m tioned that the explosive powder wa potassium chloride, aluminium pow and sulphur. Potassium chloride is inert substance like common salt (sodi chloride) and therefore cannot be a pa the composition of an explosive su ance. It is potassium chlorate that is explosive substance.

Ollur, Kerala V.P. SUKUMA

■ The bombs which exploded am unsuspecting citizens, have sounde final alarming bell that Sikh terrorism assumed a new frightening dimensi With the extremists having a rollick time killing people with gay abandon, question that has assumed monstrous p portions is the future of the Punjab cr and the solution that has hitherto elu the Government. This diabolical episo is no warning. It is real. The coun deserves an assurance that someth 'real' is being done to combat the mer nary extremists.

Sarani, Madhya Pradesh C.S. NAGESH KU

■ These extremists definitely do belong to any religion, all they are i rested in is to wreck India's unity as w to bring turbulence and instability to country. If they had been Sikhs as claim to be they would not have killed nocent people but found some other to press their demands. The Governm should stop any kind of negotiations take stern action to curb the violence. This might save the reputation of the Sikhs from being ruined.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Lucknow SHANKAR SINGH

■ The recent bombing attacks on innocent Indians are acts of terrorism and should, without question, be condemned. While no terrorist group has taken credit for these attacks, Sikhs are being suspected. As a Sikh I deplore any act of terrorism and am sure that a vast majority of the Sikhs feel the same way. In fact, such acts violate the very tenets of Sikhism. It is becoming more and more clear that these actions represent desperate attempts by the extremists to further alienate the Sikhs from the mainstream Indians. Fortunately, the Hindu backlash expected by the extremists was prevented. Serious incidents of this type can take place yet again and the ensuing divisive effects can only be neutralised through restraint and understanding.

Yorba Linda, California SATWINDER SINGH SADHAL

■ The bomb explosions are a grim reminder of the fact that there are elements in the country which do not want to see an amicable solution to the Punjab problem. Every time the Government makes gestures of conciliation to the Sikhs, the terrorists are out to sabotage the efforts for peace. Since the terrorists are trying to stigmatise the entire Sikh community, the Sikhs should denounce them in the strongest possible terms. As long as these terrorists operate freely, the path towards peace in Punjab will remain more and more elusive.

Kathmandu SANJAY UPADHYA

EYE-OPENER

Your article "Blood Banks: Trading in Blood" (May 31) will be an eye-opener to the general public and the elite at large. Dr J.N. Vajifdar has very rightly said that the poor get very good blood and the rich often get very poor blood.

The poster on blood donation was very good and so was the caption. But still, how many persons donate blood voluntarily? We need tremendous amount of visual publicity to educate the public and to drive out misconceptions. The Government should put a blanket ban on private blood banks and labs. No Government hospital should accept any blood from these private places and should also stop this system of reimbursement.

Nagpur DR RAVINDRA JHARIA

■ One way of relieving the scarcity of blood is by efficient use. Seldom does any patient require "whole blood". Most patients require only a particular fraction of the blood. Thus, one patient may need the red cells, another the clotting factors, or the plasma or the platelets or so on. By separating these fractions the same bottle can benefit many patients. In fact, in some patients "whole blood" is not effective and treatment with separated blood is vital. Many of these separation techniques are simple. However, even the blood banks of our prestigious institutions have neglected this aspect.

New Delhi RAJIV BAJAJ

PLANNING GAPS

Jay Dubashi has hit the nail on the head when he says that while our macro-scale thinking is good, our micro-level execution seems to suffer from lack of interest ("Industrial Targets: Thinking Small", May 31). But I doubt whether the Planning Commission is the right agency to see that the targets laid down by it are met. Surely the role of the Planning Commission is to think big and if it does resort to thinking small, it will be missing the woods for the trees.

In our present internal environment, achievement of national targets seems to be relegated to second place as against personal aggrandisement, to a large extent. This reflects a malady in the behavioural patterns of individuals and groups. Unless this pattern is changed the gap between perception and practice will persist.

Bangalore BRIG V. NAGABHUSHAN

MAN MANAGEMENT

It is neither a secret nor a shame that private companies pay their employees well ("PEICO: Executive Cornucopia", May 31). I have worked for many years for a profitable multinational in India, and a great deal of commitment and loyalty I have towards my employer is due to the fact that my personal needs were well looked after—and I have responded by working hard and conscientiously. This is true of all fellow employees, not just managers, and as a result the whole company works efficiently and generates wealth and prospers.

While, of course, all companies must adhere to the laws of the country and pay taxes wherever due, whether they house their managers in five-star hotels or not is nobody's business.

London MUKESH PANT

CALLOUS ATTITUDE

The Shiv Sena chief Bal Thackeray was quoted saying "Our movement is not an Assam for the Assamese type of agitation" ("Fuelling Fears", May 31). But here in Assam we wonder from where he has heard that. The agitation that has been going on here for the last six years is to drive out the non-Indians from the state and there are several lakhs of non-Assamese living here peacefully ever since the agitation began. Bal Thackeray should realise that this kind of a statement could hurt anyone, whether they are Assamese or Maharashtrians. It is ironical that the very same leaders talk about national unity and communal harmony and then go around making statements that would help in the feeling of growing alienation and incite communal passions.

Guwahati JAYANTA BARMAN

■ Bal Thackeray is behaving as if he holds the key to the metropolis and can play with the lives of the residents of Bombay. His organisation consists mostly of hoodlums, and lumpen elements, many of whom have a criminal past and have been detained under NSA. Bal Thackeray has raised his head again after lying low since the Bhiwandi riots which he engineered. He wants the Muslims to qualify to his standards to be able to live in Bombay. What he doesn't realise is that it is the Muslims along with the Parsis and Gujaratis who have made Bombay what it is today and it was long before Thackeray and his hordes descended the ghats.

He contemptuously refers to the Muslims as traitors. But this so-called super patriot must know that the non-Muslims are ahead of the Muslims in anti-national and espionage activities.

Bombay IBRAHIM NADIM

ADVOCATE FOR PEACE

Your article "Extreme Charges" (May 15) accuses Bhajan Singh Jogi (Siri Singh Sahib Bhai Sahib Harbhajan Singh Khalsa Yogijar) of being "committed to the extremist cause". Nothing could be farther from the truth. As a spiritual leader, he has always been an advocate for the peaceful resolution of all political problems. He does not now nor has he ever supported the "extremist cause". Your libellous accusation severly undermines his ability to continue to work for peace.

How not to grow a lamp-post from a friend's head and a few tips on good composition.

Composition is one of the most elusive and individual aspects of photography. While everyone agrees it's an absolute necessity, they all have their own concept of what it is! There is the modernistic school of thought, the traditionalist, the static and dynamic style and many more. But you don't have to bother about all that. Here are a few simple guidelines that can make your photography so much better ... compositionally speaking.

India Photographic Company Limited — a Kodak affiliate

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Composition and organisation

Simply put, composition is visual organisation. It includes, but is not limited to how you place your subject in the frame – and the effect that it will have on all the other elements in the picture. Compose carefully and you can emphasize your subject (which is what you want to do) while keeping all unnecessary and distracting things out of the picture (which is where they should be).

Good composition involves the choice of vertical or horizontal framing, the position of the camera subject placement, contrasts and isolating details.

This isn't as difficult as it may sound, and with a little practice, it will become very easy ... and your pictures better.

Vertical or horizontal

Simple. A palm tree, the Qutab Minar and Amitabh Bachchan need vertical frames. A mountain range or a seascape need a horizontal frame. In both cases, you've added to the height and the width. For portraits, use the vertical format, it adds character.

Static or dynamic

Balanced picture makes for a Static composition. It would probably be a picture shot on a quiet, calm day. Dynamic composition is one in which the picture seems to 'move' – a picture tilted, placed at a slant or distorted would be 'dynamic'. Work out your 'response' before you shoot. And shoot.

Framing

While there's nothing wrong with putting your subject squarely in the centre of the frame, you can change your pictures dramatically by placing your subject to the left or right of the centre or a bit higher or lower than usual. One peek through the view-finder should be enough to decide.

Framing action

The ground rule for shooting action: anticipate. Try to set your focus first, try to get to the best shooting point, and get there in time. Not too difficult at all. Fill the frame; get all the action. Pick a shooting distance that lets you fill at least one quarter to one third of the picture area with significant action. And please keep a safe distance if the action is dangerous!

Framing the outdoors

A basic point for shooting the outdoors: find a dominant feature of the landscape and concentrate on it. Filling the frame with the principal subject is vitally important. Frame your scenics with a person or object in the foreground and you'll add interest and depth and that important sense of scale. Remember: a foreground feature that contrasts in colour and/or tone with distant areas is more effective in creating the illusion of depth than one that looks similar.

Contrast and shock

Contrasting elements are the building blocks of intelligent composition. Almost any kind of contrast helps structure a photograph. Contrasts of tone, colour, sharpness, size and subjects are fair game. Like a white flower in a bunch of red roses ... a child in a crowd of grown-ups ... a crow among doves ... just be careful not to overdo it.

Kodak – an internationally renowned name in photographic excellence.

Kodak and professionals agree that a camera is as good as the film in it. Which is why we put so much effort into providing photographers with the finest range of films, processing chemicals and papers. Products responsive to any situation, able to capture the textures, richness or subtlety of mood.

Even more important, Kodak products are reliable and consistent in their quality. Year after year. Batch after batch.

A quick solution to the rush hour traffic

Office Automation Products from BPL. For total information management.

Their role in coping with the increasing volume of information flow, and as a result improving productivity through information management, is assuming greater importance.

Machines like the 852 Copier that also speaks will take the office closer to the future.

Office Automation Products from BPL. They also include Multi-user Computer Systems, Small Business Systems, Word Processors, Electronic Scanners and Private Automatic Exchanges.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Computers, Communications, Components, Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement), and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Sanyo, Japan. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL: Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

First Things First

THE CONTRASTS are obvious. On the one hand, there is the regular flow of encouraging policy pronouncements, signifying new beginnings, changes of direction, and a renewed will to achieve stated objectives. The new textile policy has been widely hailed for doing away with the irrational shibboleths of the past, for giving cotton textile mills a new chance to compete with powerlooms, and for laying the foundation-stone for the future growth of a troubled industry. Another announcement last month gave a shot in the arm for a second troubled industry that has seen insufficient growth, pharmaceuticals, by freeing 82 drugs from licensing restrictions. Earlier announcements have given a boost to the electronics and computer industries, while the Central Budget and the new export-import policy charted a new course for the economy in significant ways.

If all this underlines the Government's desire to push ahead with economic growth and change, there is an equally regular flow of disturbing economic news carrying a quite different message. The Planning Commission has announced that the Seventh Five-Year Plan will have a Rs 180,000-crore investment programme, as originally scheduled, but this will be at the latest prices instead of 1983-84 prices, thereby implicitly reducing the level of real investment by about 10 per cent. And the details of sectoral financial allocations indicate a serious financial crunch.

The 1985-90 power programme, for instance, will have a 22,000-mw target, only slightly larger than the last quinquennium's initial target of 19,666 mw. The final target for the seventh plan is well short of the initial target of installing close to 30,000 mw. This spells near-stagnation on a vital front, and suggests that there will be no escape from continuing power shortages.

There are other examples. The Communications Ministry had initially hoped for a seventh plan outlay of Rs 12,500 crore so that the endemic shortage of telephones would be a thing of the past by 1990. But only a fraction of this money is now being made available. Even worse, the exploration and development budget of the Oil and Natural Gas Commission has been severely slashed because of the financial stringency, so that the push on the oil front during the last five years will now give way to a slower pace of expansion.

Electricity, oil, communications: these are all basic economic needs, and the absence of sufficient investment in them can only spell trouble. So no matter how encouraging the Government's policy announcements, and irrespective of how enthusiastically the concerned industries respond to these announcements, the economy cannot climb on to a higher growth curve. If that is the central message coming through the scattered bits of economic news in recent weeks and months, the Government must sit up and take notice without delay, and search for appropriate solutions.

If the problem is money, the answer must lie in the budget. Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh introduced a great many changes in his first budget earlier this year, most of which were welcome. But he failed to address himself to the central problem of a growing fiscal crisis, the increasing deficits and the absence of any rise in the economy's savings and investment rate over the last few years. Indeed, the reports now speak of the budget deficit being Rs 1,000 crore higher than the already record level that Singh had projected just a little over two months ago. This may or may not be the case, but there can be no question that the fiscal signals are not encouraging.

Both Singh and his predecessor as finance minister, Pranab Mukherjee, have pointed out that three-quarters of non-plan expenditure by the Government goes on just three items: defence, subsidies of various sorts and interest payments on government loans. Yet this analysis has not so far been used for initiating corrective action. The subsidies may in fact go up, the country seems set on a course that entails large-scale defence spending, and there would seem to be little room for reducing the interest burden on the public debt that the Government has already acquired.

But this cannot be the end of the matter. It is surely possible to cut out the flab in the defence budget without endangering the defence forces' preparedness in any way. And there is absolutely no justification for a situation where the subsidies on foodgrains, fertiliser, exports and some other items, are currently running at well over Rs 2,000 crore. So, clearly, corrective action is possible if the Government puts its mind to it.

What the decision-makers in New Delhi do not seem to have realised is that this is a serious problem which cannot be shelved any longer. The failure to undertake sufficient investment now in key sectors can make nonsense of all the talk of heading for the 21st century, and make the Government's well-intentioned and largely well-conceived policy changes turn out to be non-starters on the ground.

So it is time the Government diverted its attention for a while from the new policy thrusts and went back to the old issues of savings and investment, economic surpluses and fiscal balance. Some of the lost ground in the plan can be regained by ensuring better project implementation and shorter gestation periods. These are somewhat tiresome issues that have evaded solutions for a long time, and they are not very fashionable talking points just now. But if they are not quickly placed at the top of the Government's economic agenda, the economy cannot be expected to perform very much better in the future than it has in the past.

"The geometry factor in art, introduced by early Egyptian architects and artisans, has had a lasting impact on aesthetic concepts of today.

In fashion, the elements of geometry come as a liberating relief from the dominance of floral patterns. The geometric line becomes the fashionable stripe, the point and circle, a dot, the square, a check. Add to these the cube, zig-zag, diamond and arc and we have a panoply of shapes, simple yet permanent. Since these shapes are fundamental, they allow ground colours to have full play.

"Geometric" is the new story line for Garden-Vareli fabrics — trendy, futuristic...in keeping with the image of the modern woman as a liberated one."

PLAYING PANDIT

■ One person essential to the traditional Hindu wedding is the pandit. Indispensable as they are, the pandits find the going good during the marriage season.

However, they aren't that indispensable. In recent times supply has increasingly tended to lag behind demand and Indian ingenuity has found a way, even though it means bending the rules a bit, as was evident in a number of weddings in Dhule district of Maharashtra.

Even as the bride and groom wandered around the fire, the soothing chant of shlokas could be heard, each shloka tying the nuptial knot that much tighter. Amazingly, no pandit was present at the fireside although the boy and girl received precise instructions on what to do and when. The answer was electronics: a cassette recorder played out a pre-recorded tape of the entire ceremony which went off without a hitch. The electronic priest came cheap for about Rs 50 a tape, and what was more, it didn't have to be fed afterwards. A few doubting Thomases wondered if the whole thing was entirely legal, but their voices were drowned in the general acclaim for the latest indication that India was at last in the 20th if not the 21st century.

TIPPLING TUSKERS

■ Take an elephant, add several pegs, and what do you get? You get a tipsy tusker. If there happen to be three elephants, then you get a vaudeville act in broad daylight, such as travellers on the main road at Nadukanichuram in Tamil Nadu had the delightful privilege of watching recently.

The booze bash began when bootlegger Anthony was arrested by excise men and led them into the forest where he had stored 12 drums of arrack. Before the cops could say "Amar, Akbar..." three wild elephants smashed their way onto centre stage, in time to witness several pairs of heels and 12 lovely brimming drums. They polished off the entire consignment, soon found that the jungle was too restricted a picnic spot, and danced towards the main road, where they got in the way of several bemused trucks and truck-drivers. The jam-session went on until dusk came softly down on the landscape but when the excise party returned with reinforcements the elephants had vanished into the jungles, thoughtfully leaving behind one arrack drum as proof against Anthony.

BRIEF PROTEST

■ India is the land of protests and they come in all shapes and sizes, from the massive demonstrations orchestrated by Datta Samant to the lone hunger-striker squatting outside his office.

Last fortnight, the Tantrik Kamgar Union of the Maharashtra State Electricity Board asked its members at the Koradi thermal power station at Nagpur to do something which will surely rank as one of the more unusual protests: not to wear any clothes—or rather, to wear only briefs and banians when they came on June 1 to collect their pay-packets. The reason for the undress protest is that the workers' demand for better uniforms was not being conceded by the management for a long time and the workers decided to take most of their clothes off to press their point that they needed stronger and slicker uniforms to function better.

The May 1 protest was not just symbolic: a thermal power station is not the healthiest of environments and the union warned of dire physical consequences if the workers strolled around semi-naked in an atmosphere choked with fumes. Thus the union was striking on both the aesthetic and physical fronts, a double-barrelled protest if ever there was one.

MANGO FOOL

■ It was an innocent-looking crate, standing quietly in a corner of the luggage van of the Madurai-bound Pandian Express. However, the officers and men of the Railway Protection Force were convinced it was packed with bombs. Slowly, ever so slowly, the crate was lifted out and drenched with water.

Not entirely persuaded that the machine infernale had been rendered harmless, the police took the crate to an open field nearby and carefully pried open the top. Inside were rows of smooth round objects, yellow and red in colour, nestling in straw. The uninitiated would have immediately fallen upon them and stuffed them into their mouths, but the police had other ideas. Positive that they were cleverly comouflaged hand grenades, they poured more water on them.

Dozens of gallons later one police officer plucked up the courage to pick up a piece. He peeled it, tasted it, and —yummi—liked it. And the entire khaki-clad horde fell upon the ripe Alphonso mangoes like so many starved souls and gorged to their heart's content.

MAHARASHTRA

The Succession Stakes

IT WAS late on the night of June 3 when two journalists accompanied by a bureaucrat friend called at "Meghdoot", the house of Shivajirao Patil-Nilangekar, who had been sworn in as the chief minister of Maharashtra a few hours ago. Nilangekar, said members of his personal staff, was not home; he had gone to the "chief minister's house" and would be back after two hours. Nilangekar's staff members did not even realise this gaffe till the bureaucrat reminded them that this was now the chief minister's house and not "Varsha", where Nilangekar had gone to call on Vasantrao Patil.

But the confusion in Nilangekar's staff members can be pardoned; though out of office, Patil was still seen as the man in the driving seat. After the new ministry, virtually unchanged, was sworn in, at least a dozen ministers went up and touched Patil's feet; a lady minister even burst into tears. The crowd of callers at Varsha hardly abated as long as Patil was there; the two vast air-conditioned sitting-rooms in the bungalow were always full of favour-seekers. It is rare in Congress politics that a deposed chief minister continues to hog the limelight but clearly "Dada", the last of the charismatic Congress (I) chief ministers, was an exception.

Patil's continued lustre was mainly because he was widely seen to have outsmarted the party high command on the chess-board of politics. In a party where chief ministers are casually changed one day after they have taken the oath of office—remember Arjun Singh?—opinion makers were unanimous that Patil had managed to emerge the victor even though he had lost the battle.

He had questioned the propriety of Rajiv Gandhi being both prime minister and president of the Congress(I); when beckoned to Delhi, seemingly to be reprimanded, he had gone away in a huff when asked to wait for a day to see Rajiv; back in Bombay, he had let it be known that he would rather quit than accept Prabha Rao, the high command's nominee, as the new Pradesh Congress (I) Committee chief; he had steadfastly held to his decision even as four high command observers camped in Bombay, seemingly to persuade him to stay; he had even spurned the prime minister's appeal to change his decision and, as indicated, had announced his resignation within a few hours of Rajiv's departure from Bombay on June 1.

NAMAS BHOJANI

V.P. Singh, Nilangekar and Patil at the CLP(I) meeting: smooth transition

That was not all. He had ensured that one of his three nominees succeeded him—the same Nilangekar to whom the high command had denied a ticket for the assembly elections three months ago. What is more, because Nilangekar is a true-blood Maratha (belonging to the shahanno kuli, the 96 original Maratha families), he had ensured that power had stayed with his traditionally ruling caste. And, finally, he had effectively destroyed the chances of his arch-rival, Sharad Pawar, entering the party as its chief in Maharashtra—as political circles had been speculating. Said Madhav Gadkari, editor of the Marathi daily, Loksatta: "Three months ago, Pawar fought the elections on the issue of the asmita (self-respect) of Maharashtra being in danger because of growing interference from Delhi but it is Dada who has actually upheld Maharashtra's asmita."

Officially, of course, there was no balance sheet being totalled as neither Patil nor the high command were willing to go on record with their version of the events. But power wielders in Delhi saw the situation in dramatically different terms. A member of the high command, who spoke to INDIA TODAY on being assured of anonymity, argued that all media speculation had been wide off the mark. The real reason for Patil's decision to quit was his failing health, he said. Patil, 68, is known to suffer from diabetes, sciatica and high blood pressure but the seriousness of Patil's diabetes is not widely known. Unable to curb his fondness for sweets, Patil has so enfeebled himself that his legs have begun to give way; he cannot walk for more than half an hour at a stretch without getting his legs massaged. "In our system, a chief minister is on the job all 24 hours and Dada was doing his best, but finally his failing health ate into his confidence," he said.

He maintained that there was no rancour between Patil and the high command, so the question of making things difficult for Patil, let alone asking him to go, did not arise. "We have supported him fully all these years. We think Dada is a competent leader, a warm human being and a man of his word. We don't hold his so-called statements against the prime minister against him; Dada has let fly like this so often in the past but we know he does not mean what he says."

The high command source said the selection of Nilangekar was in keeping with the new system of choosing the consensus candidate. "In Maharashtra the consensus was in favour of having a Maratha." Summing up the political developments in the state, he said: "We did not expect the changes in Maharashtra to create more than a ripple and they did not." There is no doubt that Patil's health problems are major, or that Patil, who was Rajiv's nominee, had been constantly supported by Rajiv and his men, but there were few takers apart from Sharad Pawar either among the AICC(I) observers or among Patil's men or his detractors within and without the party for the high command members' facile explanation for Patil's resignation.

The handful of members who comprise the high command (by common consensus, they are: Rajiv Gandhi, Arun Singh, Arun Nehru and M.L. Fotedar), might claim that there has been no change in the warm vibes they have always had with Patil but there was no dearth of allegations and recriminations in the lower echelons. Of the four AICC(I) observers—Finance Minister V.P. Singh, former Union minister and Rajya Sabha MP P.Shiv Shankar, Party Treasurer Sitaram Kesari and AICC(I) General Secretary in-charge of Maharashtra, G.K. Moopanar—who spent five days in Bombay overseeing the change of guard, three spoke to INDIA TODAY on the circumstances leading to Patil's resignation and Nilangekar's accession. Their main contentions were:

► Patil would brook no opposition within the party; he wanted only his men to be selected for party and government posts and legislative nominations. "This was unacceptable as the high command has to think of all the factions."

► Patil had proved inexplicably stubborn on the question of Rao's appointment. He had earlier agreed to take Rao in the cabinet but now he wouldn't accept her as the PCC(I) chief. "A chief minister is so much more powerful than the PCC (I) chief. Couldn't a shrewd politician like Dada have learned to live with a PCC(I) chief who happened to be not on the same wavelength with him?"

► Patil had shown no inclination to meet the high command half-way. He had made no attempt to talk to Rajiv while the two had travelled together. Finally, Rajiv had to send for Patil and request him, in vain, to stay on.

The observers would not categorically say so but there was little doubt that the appointment of Rao, a Maratha from Vidarbha, who has long been at odds with Patil, was a calculated rebuff to Patil. And the high command knew that her ap-

SHIVAJIRAO PATIL-NILANGEKAR

'I am here for the full term'

IT WAS fortuitous for Shivajirao Patil-Nilangekar that he had not vacated "Meghdoot", his ministerial bungalow on Bombay's Malabar Hill, when he ceased being a minister nearly three months ago. It would have been difficult for Nilangekar's staff to cope with the rush to their leader's house after he was somewhat unexpectedly made the chief minister on June 3. In "Meghdoot" Nilangekar had at least an office where entry could be regulated, though the small cubby hole with a modest desk, files overflowing from cupboards on to the floor and a spittoon for the pan-chewing chief minister could hardly be termed as being luxurious.

Four days after being sworn in, Nilangekar had yet to attend to work at his Mantralaya office, but he was busy enough at home meeting top officials in the administration and the police. Breaking off from the rush of callers, the new chief minister spoke to Assistant Editor AJAY KUMAR in an hour-long interview. Excerpts:

Q. You are neither an MLA nor an MLC; Mr Sushil Kumar Shinde and Mr Sudhakarrao Naik were rated as having better chances than you to become the chief minister. Do you think your being a Maratha made all the difference?

A. I don't think my being a Maratha made any difference at all. I have been an MLA for the last 23 years and I was one of the three contenders this time. I was chosen because that was the consensus that the AICC(I) observers arrived at after meeting the MLA's. I am not merely the nominee of the high command. And as for not being a member of either house, nor was Dada when he was made the chief minister.

Nilangekar: close to all

HEMANT PITHWA

Q. Do you know if any MLA*'s indicated a preference for you?*

A. I am not aware if any, or how many MLA's preferred me but I certainly hope many of them did.

Q. You are supposed to be Vasantdada's man and this impression has been reinforced by the fact that you more or less retained his entire ministry. Is this correct?

A. I am close to all, not just to Dada. The decisions on the ministry are mine, not Dada's. I consulted some of the leaders but did not act on anybody's instructions. If the names are the same that is only a coincidence. In any case, even in the old ministry everybody was not a follower of Dada.

Q. The appointment of Prabha Rao as the PCC(I) chief was oneof the reasons for Vasantdada's resignation. Do you foresee any problems with her and did you consult her before you formed your ministry?

A. I would not like to comment on Dada's reasons for leaving but I foresee

pointment would trigger a strong reaction from Patil; the latter was still in Delhi when the four party observers caught a flight to Bombay on the morning of May 29. Confirming that serious differences had arisen between Patil and the high command, a senior AICC(I) functionary said Patil had pushed his luck too far. He had managed to pressurise the high command into accepting only his nominees for the assembly elections by raising the bogey of joining hands with Pawar and then had begun to think that he was indispensable. "Even after his statements against the prime minister and the computer boys he never thought that conditions would be created where he would have no option but to quit."

Yet another issue on which Patil had reportedly created unhappiness was his purported role in helping the Shiv Sena win the Bombay municipal polls in April. Murli Deora, president of the Bombay Regional Congress(I) Committee whose resignation was turned down by the high command in another rebuff to Patil, is known to feel that just because he did not accept Patil's list of 171 candidates in toto, Patil created a climate in favour of the Shiv Sena by suggesting that there was a move to make Bombay into a Union territory (which the Shiv Sena successfully made into an emotional anti-Maharashtrians issue) and by implying that there were "anfisocials" in the Congress (I) list.

Patil's, too, men had their own set of complaints against the high command. They grant that Rajiv was primarily responsible for Patil ascending the chair but they argue that of late Patil had begun to get the feeling that the humiliation he had had to suffer under Mrs Gandhi was being repeated. As evidence they cite:

► Four of the five Congress (I) nominees for the governor's quota to the legislative council were known to be anti-Patil men. Of the four, Patil's antipathy to N.K. Tirpude, once deputy chief minister under Patil, is well known.

► The high command cut out the name of Dr W.R. Sherekar from the list of ministers with the result that there was no no problems with her. And yes, I did consult her before I formed the ministry.

Q. Wasn't it rather unusual that you did not go to Delhi before you formed your ministry?

A. The convention till now has been for the chief minister to get the list cleared by Delhi but in my case the high command merely gave me some guidelines. The final list was not cleared by it. This is a healthy development.

Q. One of the three ministers you dropped is Vilasrao Deshmukh, who is said to be your rival from Latur district. Wouldn't you have shown political magnanimity by retaining him?

A. In forming my ministry I had to provide representation to all castes, communities and regions. In a democratic set up there can be differences of opinion but that cannot be the basis for decisions like forming a ministry. Vilasrao is a much junior person to me, how can he be my rival?

Q. You are the fourth Congress (I) chief minister in five years. What makes you think you will not go the way of Antulay, Bhosale and Patil?

A. I am confident that my government will be stable and the party will stick together because the circumstances have changed and most of the MLA's are new. I don't think you can draw a link with what happened in the last term.

Q. Do you think Patil's resignation was designed to make it difficult for Sharad Pawar to join the Congress (I) and that you are only a stopgap chief minister till Pawar takes over?

A. I don't think all this talk about Pawar coming into the Congress (I) had anything to do with Dada's resignation. But I am not a stopgap chief minister. I am here for the full term unless the high command thinks otherwise.

Q. Family members of earlier chief ministers prospered. Do you see the need for extra vigilance on this count?

A. I am not aware of what happened with other chief ministers but I am confident nothing of this sort will happen with my family.

Q. Constant political interference has affected the morale of the state bureaucracy. How do you propose to restore their confidence?

A. I will ensure there is no undue interference. In our democratic set-up some politicians may try to interfere but the bureaucrats should use their discretion.

Q. Regions like Marathwada, Vidarbha and Konkan feel neglected. Do you intend to take a personal interest in correcting the imbalances?

A. That there are regional imbalances cannot be denied. We have decided to wipe out this by the end of the eighth plan. Rs 1,500 crore has been sanctioned for this purpose.

Q. Some pronouncements by Vasantdada and the threat by Bal Thackeray of restricting entry into Bombay has made non-Maharashtrians worried. What is the problem and what is your solution?

A. Constitutionally we cannot restrict entry into Bombay, so non-Maharashtrians need have no fear. Yet, it is undeniable that there is a considerable influx and a lot of burden on the existing amenities of the city. The main problem is of finance so we have requested the Centre for funds over and above the plan allocations.

Q. Bal Thackeray has threatened to launch an agitation over the non-inclusion of a Marathi-speaking minister from Bombay. What is the problem with taking W.R. Sherekar or any other Marathi-speaking MLA from Bombay into the ministry?

A. Sherekar's name was not considered this time but I only need some time to think before I take some Marathi-speaking MLA. I will definitely take one when I expand my ministry. As for Thackeray, how can I say anything on what he proposes to do.

Marathi-speaking minister from among the Bombay MLA's. Patil had to suffer great embarrassment because he had included Sherekar in the list he had released. In spite of repeated requests, the high command did not clear him. (But according to one of the observers, he had personally got Sherekar's name cleared from Rajiv but Patil had stalled, saying that he first wanted the MLC's issue to be decided in his favour.)

Patil, say his men, got the feeling that he was going to be asked to leave and the last straw came when he was asked to wait for a day to see the prime minister. "Dada felt that these tomorrows never came," revealed one minister. "He told me around 3 p.m. on May 29 that he had decided to quit but that he would wait for the prime minister to go back from Bombay on June 1 before announcing it because he did not want to create an 'unhealthy atmosphere' before his visit. When we asked why, he said: 'Majha manna cha nirnay ahey (It's my decision)."

Patil's followers also say that he had been deeply pained by the campaign against him by his wife, Shalinitai, and that he was genuinely concerned that if Pawar was admitted into the Congress(I) his days as the chief minister were numbered. Prakash Patil, whose selection as the Congress(I) candidate from Patil's home constituency of Sangli in preference to Shalinitai is the accepted cause for the intra-family rift (Prakash is Patil's only son from his first wife), feigned ignorance about why his father quit office but did accept that his stepmother's activities had upset his father. Asked if Patil was similarly upset with the high command, Prakash said: "Dada has a deep sense of hurt," but refused to elaborate.

Regardless of the controversies surrounding Patil's exit, both his detractors and his admirers are agreed that Patil has taken his last curtain call. He may still remain the helmsman for Maharashtra's powerful sugar industry, and as the last of the party's chief ministers with a mass following, his blessings would still count in the state. But the man who became chief minister four times after having renounced politics eight years ago (he said then that he was retiring because he had turned 60 but few believed him) is now a fading star. The focus had shifted from the illiterate peasant from Sangli to the 54-year-old former lawyer from Latur who was the new chief minister.

There was some doubt if Nilangekar had ever been Patil's candidate. One of the four observers maintained that Patil had never suggested Nilangekar's candidature because he did not want another Maratha to become the chief minister and erode his pre-eminent position in that powerful community. Patil's first choice was Sudhakarrao Naik, nephew of the late V.P. Naik and minister in Patil's ministry, and the only other candidate he mentioned was Sushil Kumar Shinde, finance minister in the Patil ministry. Naik was unacceptable as he was considered too close to Patil and Shinde was ruled out because he is a Harijan. "It was we," said this observer, "who said why shouldn't we consider a Maratha? Then Nilangekar's name came up but still Dada stalled, saying Nilangekar was neither an MLA nor an MLC. But we said, since when has that mattered in the Congress (I)?" However, virtually everybody else said that Nilangekar was also in Patil's list. Naik said: "We told the Central observers that if any of the three were chosen, we would give him unflinching support."

The more important question was whether Nilangekar would be able to manage the affairs of the nation's richest state. Maharashtra has been singularly unfortunate in its leadership since the Congress(I) swept to power in 1980. First Antulay wrecked the system, then Babasaheb Bhosale turned it into a cruel joke and finally Patil just let it atrophy. The upshot is there for all to see: Bombay's problems are unattended and the Shiv Sena's solutions threaten the city's cosmopolitan character; some 20,000 villages in the state still cry out for drinking water while the rain shadow regions of Marathwada and Vidarbha wait for irrigation facilities and disgruntled farmers increasingly look to Shetkari Sangathana's Sharad Joshi as their spokesman.

NAMAS BHOJANI

"I am young, I can wait. I have no regrets about Nilangekar becoming the chief minister."

SUSHIL KUMAR SHINDE

Politically, too, Nilangekar's task is daunting. The Congress (I) has a bare 17-member majority in the 288-member House. The Opposition is led by the formidable Sharadchandra Govindrao Pawar, currently in some trouble with his partners in the 104-member Progressive Democratic Front but with Patil out, unquestionably the most charismatic politician in Maharashtra. Tired of the turnover of Congress (I) chief ministers (four since 1980), there is a perceptible yearning among the citizenry to see the young (44) and capable Pawar as the chief minister. But this is unlikely to happen, even if, as is virtually certain, he enters the Congress(I). Pawar himself is reported to be keen that he be kept away from power so that people do not see him as a defector. Besides, the Congress (I) leadership is aware of the tremors his entry will send through party ranks. Yet, it is also undeniable that no Congress(I) leader in Maharashtra is seen as more capable or more popular than Pawar.

Clearly, the challenge before Nilangekar is stupendous and few believe that he will be able to overcome it. Politically, his record is uninspiring. He had been winning continuously from Nilanga since 1962 yet, even in Marathwada's seven districts, his pre-eminence does not extend beyond his home district of Latur, where too he is challenged by Shivraj Patil.

NAMAS BHOJANI

"We told the central observers that if any of the three were chosen, we would give him support."

SUDHAKARRAO NAIK

Worse, he is said to lack political vision, letting himself be ensnared in petty district-level politics. Said Padamsinh Patil, Congress (S) state chief who also hails from Marathwada: "I never thought he was chief minister material."

His image is better as an administrator. Nilangekar first became a minister in 1974 and has been a cabinet minister since 1978, handling important portfolios like irrigation. Bureaucrats say that though not an engineer he has complete mastery over the Irrigation Ministry. Said one official in Bombay's Mantralaya: "He does not try to bulldoze us like Antulay. If he wants a political favour done, he will see it is done within the rules. And he knows which bureaucrats can be bent and who has to be handled with care."

The general feeling, however, is that his record has little to recommend him. Said Govindrao Talwalkar, editor of the Maharashtra Times: "Nilangekar is a faceless leader who is acceptable to both Dada and the high command because they feel he will be amenable to their wishes. I do not think he has the guts to come out of the shadow of Dada." Asked if Nilangekar was the most capable man to lead the party, Shinde said "that is a very difficult question to answer."

Others credit him with greater political shrewdness. Prabhakar Kunte, a former minister and a maverick Congress(I) man who openly favours the entry of Pawar, says Nilangekar, of whom he is no great admirer, will soon show that he is nobody's man. Kunte points out that Nilangekar showed political opportunism when he left S.B. Chavan's fold and switched allegiance to V.P. Naik, then the chief minister. Nilangekar has already shown the first signs of moving away from Patil's shadow. Addressing his first press conference in Delhi, he made it clear that he did not share Patil's views on curbing entry into Bombay.

There is some doubt, however, if Nilangekar will endeavour to carry even those sections of the party opposed to him. He would have shown great political magnanimity had he retained his old intra-party adversary from Latur, Vilasrao Deshmukh, 40, in the ministry but he predictably dropped him. Chavan, who had similarly dropped Nilangekar in 1975, and who is known to be Deshmukh's patron at the Centre, even issued a statement assuring support for Nilangekar but that was not good enough.

Congressmen have traditionally been their own worst enemies and talk had already started that the so-called loyalists (elements like Ramrao Adik, Baliram Hiray and Baburao Kale) had started attempts to topple Nilangekar. Their task will be very difficult: the anti-defection bill rules out their leaving the party; the party high command does not set much store by loyalists ("Does being a loyalist mean you can do anything ? Does loyalty have a price?" asked the high command member) and it vows to extend full support to Nilangekar. "Nilangekar is not a stopgap chief minister," asserted the high command member. But Shinde summed up the average Congress(I) man's attitude: "If Nilangekar acts properly, we will continue to support him."

HEMANT PITHWA

There was little doubt that the appointment of Prabha Rao, who has long been at odds with Patil, was a calculated rebuff.

Yet, Shinde is no rebel in the making. As he philosophised: "I have no regrets about Nilangekar becoming the chief minister;I am grateful that the name of a Harijan even figured among the contenders. I am young, I can wait."

For the Congress (I), trouble could come from another quarter: the feeling is growing among the party that the high command is a little too willing to have a Maratha in charge, even though Marathas comprise only 24 per cent of the state's population. Even Shinde is reported to feel that the only reason why Nilangekar pipped him is because he is a Maratha. And as one Bombay MP pointed out: "Marathas used to complain that they get too few tickets but this time they got the maximum number and still we got such a thin majority."

In its handling of Maharashtra, the high command was also seen as incompetent and inconsistent. As Talwalkar argued: "First it got taken in by Dada's threat to join hands with Pawar and gave Dada a free hand for the assembly elections, not realising that its fears of a Dada-Pawar Maratha hegemony were unfounded. Then it tried to ease Dada out but Dada proved smarter. The high command has emerged with little credit." A senior party functionary confirmed that Patil had hinted that he would join hands with Pawar if he wasn't given a free hand for the assembly tickets and the threat had worked. If true, it was a poor reflection on the political acumen of the members of the high command.

Nilangekar's mettle, and that of his political masters, will soon be tested. One issue that could confront them sooner than they might expect is the growing feeling of neglect among Maharashtrians in Bombay. Even Nilangekar has omitted to take a Marathi-speaking minister from Bombay. Bal Thackeray, the Shiv Sena leader and no longer a paper tiger with the Bombay Municipal Corporation in his control, has threatened to launch an agitation on the issue. Elsewhere, feelings are being whipped up on the reported diversion of Rs 2 crore meant for the Mankhurd-Belapur rail link. Reflecting the feeling among middle class Maharashtrians, Gadkari thundered: "If this is the meaning of Bombay's cosmopolitanism, such cosmopolitanism can go to hell." Nilangekar, whose stature is still inadequate to the tasks ahead, could well have a stormy start.

PUNJAB

Mixed Developments

EVEN as the farmers of Punjab harvested a record wheat crop of nearly 10 million tonnes and prepared for a record paddy season, the mood elsewhere in the state over the last fortnight was far from being festive. As the authorities readied to meet the Akali Dal call to Sikhs to observe the anniversary of Operation Bluestar as 'ghallughara' (genocide) week, security deployment in the state was reminiscent of the Bluestar days last June. Over 200 companies of the Border Security Force, Central Reserve Police Force, Punjab Armed Police, besides the regular police force were requisitioned for patrol duty. The army was on half-an-hour's notice and sensitive villages remained virtually under siege. "We are taking no chances," Governor Arjun Singh said. Over 100 alleged terrorists were nabbed, and the police claimed to have solved at least 12 recent cases of killing.

Although Akali Dal chief Sant Harchand Singh Longowal's assurances that the protest observance would be peaceful were vindicated communal violence broke out in the bustling cities of Ludhiana, Khanna and Hoshiarpur (see box). Places of worship in many areas were turned into arsenals and shelters for criminals and killers. Police raids unearthed swords, trishuls and acid bombs. Drums of diesel and petrol, ostensibly in readiness to set fire to shops and houses were recovered.

For the panic-stricken people, the situation was further complicated by shrieking headlines in most local newspapers. Despite appeals by the governor, rumours were flashed across front pages: Hind Samachar and Punjab Kesari headlined a report from Sultanpur Lodhi saying that several girls had become unconscious after drinking water from a school handpump "poisoned" by terrorists. Though the police denied the story within two hours, the newspapers did not bother to make amends.

In the atmosphere of panic and tension, the Akalis were able to assert and control their over-zealous followers. Over a dozen meetings addressed by Longowal and other Akali leaders passed off peacefully, as did the prayer meetings in all gurudwaras. "By being peaceful we have given a lie to the Government propaganda that we indulge in violence. The panic was created by the Government to malign us," Longowal said.

Equally satisfied was Governor Arjun Singh since his strategy—to keep the force on a warlike vigil and initiate moves to mobilise people—was paying off. The Akalis boycotted his state-level amity committee meeting. "The next state- level meeting will surely have the Akalis in it," Singh said. And the Akalis have demanded more representation on it, showing their willingness to participate. Singh told INDIA TODAY that this game plan was to use the 'people for peace' movement to force the Akalis to come to the negotiating table.

Meanwhile the battle for power in the Akali Dal entered a decisive stage. Bhindranwale's father Baba Joginder Singh addressed a 10,000-strong audience at Manji Sahib in the Golden Temple complex, urging them to unite and prepare to defend themselves and their faith. The dominant mood at the six-hour meeting was militant with tributes being paid to assassins Beant Singh and Satwant Singh and slogans raised against Longowal, Tohra and Badal. But lines within the Baba's faction were clearly drawn, with former Badal supporters at loggerheads with the AISSF element.

In contrast, the meeting of the Longowal faction at the same venue three days later adopted a moderate stand. With an attendance nearly three times that at the Baba's meeting, it successfully countered the threat of a group of AISSF activists who were beaten up and ousted. Ruling out any compromise with the Centre, the Akali Dal insisted all its demands should first be met and called for initiative to restore the confidence and dignity of the Sikhs.

Significantly, Longowal is emerging as the more popular leader of the party with Badal's ambivalent stand losing him many followers. Four of his former supporters, Atma Singh, P.S. Majitha, Mohinder Singh Sarupwali and Gurbachan Singh, now with Baba Joginder Singh, told INDIA TODAY that they were not prepared to accept Badal's stand that he would renounce politics rather than join the Baba.

Such hopeful signs that a moderate leadership is asserting itself in the Akali Dal and official vigilance has helped the protest week pass off relatively peacefully, however, are not enough. There is still a need for more concrete steps that could embolden the moderates to respond to the Centre's initiative.

HOSHIARPUR

Danger Signs

HOSHIARPUR has never had much to recommend it from among the towns of Punjab. Now the dirty, backward district town has earned the kind of distinction it could well do without. Though the sparks have been flying for two years, the two main communities in the state have refused to let them ignite a large-scale communal confrontation—till Hoshiarpur took the lead, on May 10. The communal clashes which started that day after the popular Lok Dal leader Chaudhri Balbir Singh was shot by extremists, have continued for over a month taking three lives and creating the apprehension that the communal amity which withstood the strain of Operation Bluestar and the November 1984 anti-Sikh riots in the rest of the country, may be on the verge of cracking.

Ironically, Balbir Singh had more Sikh followers than Hindu, but militant Hindus of the Punjab Shiv Sena seized this opportunity to show their muscle. They took charge of the Chaudhri's body before even a post-mortem could be performed or a first information report registered. A Sikh who had come to mourn the popular Chaudhri, was stabbed to death, and about 50 Sikh shops burnt down.

What followed was open strife, and then curfew with intermittent clashes. Sikhs refused to open their shops until the culprits of the first day's violence were arrested. When that happened, the Hindu shopkeepers pulled down their shutters saying they would not resume business unless the arrested persons were released. Sikhs who opened their shops faced the wrath of the Hindu activists and vice versa.

After Punjab Shiv Sena chief Jagdish Chand Tangri went on a hunger strike the authorities bought temporary peace by releasing Sunil Dutt Walia (who had been charged with murder) and all but 52 of the arrested Sena followers. But this failed to appease the Hindu activists, and a little later trouble erupted again, this time between the police and Hindu youth who tried to force open and loot Sikh shops. Policemen chasing the looters into the lanes near Shekhan mohalla were injured in stone throwing. What followed was a brutal demonstration of police reprisal: teargassing, lathi charge and firing. Scores of people were injured but at no point was any magistrate present; nor did Deputy Commissioner S.R. Bangar or Police Superintendent Chandrasekhar think it necessary to leave their offices. Both of them were transferred out a couple of days later, and Tangri was arrested under the National Security Act. A statewide bandh called by the Sena got a good response in towns such as Khanna, Gurdaspur, Hoshiarpur, Mukeian, Batala and Ludhiana.

Punjab police personnel beating up a suspect in Hoshiarpur

It had happened elsewhere in the past and this time too the Punjab police and the CRPF took opposing positions on different sides of the communal divide which has now riven the town. The Hindus blamed the Punjab police for unleashing brutal violence against them. "We have no faith in the Punjab police. It plays a communal game," charged advocate S.K. Sarwal, an adviser to the Shiv Sena. "The CRPF is totally communal; it brands every Sikh a terrorist," retorted Kulbir Singh, president of the Sikh Defence Federation. Predictably, the authorities deputed the CRPF to guard Hindu temples and Punjab police to protect the gurudwaras.

This time the CRPF and Punjab police had taken opposing stands, but some weeks ago they had openly clashed in Ferozepore. Roughing up of Punjab Roadways drivers by CRPF personnel have in the past caused flash bus strikes in Amritsar, Jalandhar and Chandigarh. After an outbreak of trouble it is not unusual for CRPF pickets on the highways to check only Sikh passengers in buses and Punjab police jawans to check only Hindus. "Is this secularism," wondered Balbirchand, an Amritsar schoolteacher.

Hoshiarpur is the latest and most serious example of communal trouble in Hindu majority towns in which the extremists have deliberately chosen to strike. Towns like Khanna and Dhariwal quietened down after minor clashes, but the continuing commotion in Hoshiarpur raises fears that with the help of vested interests, zealots of both communities and an inefficient administration, Punjab too can easily forget its legacy of Hindu-Sikh amity.

Introducing sleekness into a family car.

You save for it. Plan. Scheme. Hope. Dream. Is it worthwhile being landed with a car you don't really like the look of ? Till today, you had to grin and bear it. Not anymore. Not now, the Premier 118 NE opens out new horizons in the car market.

Sleek is in!

Spacious inside, sleek outside. That's the Premier 118 NE. Adequate ground clearance and a strong suspension makes it ideal for out-of-town driving as well. In short, it's just the right size — combining the best of big and small.

Strong — yet economical!

The modern, 4-cylinder 1.18 litre Nissan engine ensures a powerful pick-up and high fuel efficiency — upto 17 kms. per litre (according to the Government of India test procedures). Add to it easy steering and manoeuvring, smoother riding, a synchromesh system for all four forward gears... and you'll see why the Premier 118 NE makes driving a new experience.

From Premier Automobiles — of course!

The Premier 118 NE combines the sturdy body of the Fiat 124 and a modern, fuel-efficient 1.18 litre engine designed in collaboration with Nissan. PAL engineers have tested and perfected the model to suit Indian climates and road conditions.

After all, we've always given you the better car. Now, with new horizons opening up on the car scene, isn't it natural the better choice should come from us?

PREMIER 118 NE

It makes a lot more carsense!

GUJARAT

Rising Toll

LAST WEEK, the madness started all over again. Lourdes Cardoz, manager of a hotel and Nicolas D'Souza, manager of a cinema theatre, went to the Kalupur railway station in Ahmedabad to buy train tickets. But they were destined never to undertake any journey again. While standing at the station, Cardoz and D'Souza were suddenly surrounded by a group of people and stabbed again and again till they died. It was senseless and terrifying but that is the way most stabbing victims have died in Gujarat's anti-reservation stir that started three-and-a-half months ago and then suddenly escalated again last week.

The anti-reservationists called for a bandh on June 7 and, as if on cue, Ahmedabad went up in flames—rioting, arson and looting became the order of the day leaving over 33 dead and 150 injured in two days. In the curfew-bound area of Daryapur in Ahmedabad, eight members of a family were roasted alive on the afternoon of June 9. A group of armed men locked the doors and set the house on fire. When the fire brigade men and army jawans arrived, they were heavily stoned. One by one the screams coming from within the locked doors stopped. Clearly the anti-reservation stir cloaked a much more malignant hatred of one community for another.

But the business community, which has borne a loss of Rs 300 crore because of numerous bandhs and the curfew, had had enough. So, in an unprecedented move last fortnight, the entire trade downed shutters and closed its establishments for five days in protest against the deteriorating law and order situation. The last time that the trading community called for such a total closure was in 1942 during the Quit India Movement.

All activity ground to a halt. Normal life was completely paralysed. The traders' bandh gave a fillip to the Gujarat bandh by the Navrachana Samiti and the Vali Mandal, the students' and parents' associations, respectively, spearheading the anti-reservation agitation. Women squatted on roads to prevent anyone from going to work, young boys stopped cyclists and punctured the tyres of automobiles. All at once Gujarat's anti-reservation stir turned into a people's movement. Sixty-five per cent of state government employees did not go to work, obeying a call for an indefinite strike by their associations demanding the abolition of the roster system which accelerates promotions for the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.

Burnt vehicles in Ahmedabad: continuing strife

In despair, Home Minister Amarsinh Chaudhari announced double wages for those who reported for work. But few turned up. Professionals like doctors, lawyers and engineers also joined in the protest and closed their establishments. As the situation went out of control, scooterists were ordered on June 10 not to carry pillion riders because of numerous incidents of scooterists throwing bombs at passers-by.

Last week's rioting conclusively proved that the mobs had access to—and were freely using—private guns, something the police had long suspected. But their efforts in the past to unearth the private arms had thrown up only a handful of foreign-made and country-made guns and petrol bombs. Only last fortnight the army discovered —in two tunnels beneath a building in Kalupur—a huge quantity of acid bulbs, raw material for bombs and iron rods filled with explosives.

While the police futilely attempted to maintain peace and the army went on a wild goose chase through the labyrinthine alleys of old Ahmedabad, caste politics raised its ugly head again. For the first time, the influential Kshatriya lobby also moved into the battlefield, this time in support of the reservationists. Last fortnight, at a convention held near Baroda, Kshatriya leaders spoke of the need to stand by Chief Minister Madhavsinh Solanki, their reason simply being that the anti-reservationists wanted to dislodge a Kshatriya leader.

Even the backward classes are getting more organised: there have been an increasing number of Dalit meetings stressing the need to counter the stir against them. The Dalits have gained support from the Muslims who have also been made a butt of the protest. Pointed out Neerav Patel, a Dalit leader: "This agitation may be dangerous, but it has definitely helped Harijans and others from backward communities to realise that casteism is increasing and they should be united to fight for their rights." To add to the controversy, the Gujarat High Court passed an interim order asking the state Government not to reduce the reservation quota which had been increased to 28 per cent.

The suspension of trading and business activity amply illustrated the people's mood. Warned Umashankar Joshi, a well-known educationist: "The situation is suicidal. Anything that may happen now may be the last straw."

Perhaps Chief Minister Solanki realised the truth of that statement when on June 9 he conceded virtually all the demands of the anti-reservationists. After an emergency cabinet meeting, he nervously announced that the Government would not increase the reservation quota until there was a national consensus on it. It would institute a judicial inquiry into the riots, and would release the students held during the agitation. Said he: "It is now time to stop the agitation. There are no grounds now." But Solanki's appeal, not for the first time, had no takers.

AS CALCUTTA's walls filled up with colourful graffiti proclaiming the names of contestants for the June 30 municipal elections, the ruling Left Front that had so far been watching from the sidelines the internecine struggle rocking the state Congress(I) unit, finally entered the fray last fortnight. Addressing an election rally in east Calcutta, Chief Minister Jyoti Basu triggered off the first salvo by accusing the Congress(I) of having made false promises before the Lok Sabha elections. The message clearly was that the Congress(I) had led Calcutta voters up the garden path the last time, and would do the same again.

The Congress (I), fighting to restore its credibility eroded by its failure to keep its pre-Lok Sabha election promises, and hamstrung by internal cleavages, retaliated by reeling off a string of allegations against the Marxist Government. Congress(I) General Secretary Ajit Panja accused the election authorities of acting "with a mischievous political motive, with an eye to helping the Left Front in the civic polls". Despite the lowering of the age limit of voters to 18 years, Panja said, the total number of voters in the city's 141 wards had mysteriously shown a decline.

Earlier, Panja had also accused the CPI(M) of having masterminded the ransacking of his party's office. Marxist cadres, along with a section of the local police were acting as "agents provocateurs", he charged, adding that persons who could smash portraits of Mrs Indira Gandhi and Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi could not possibly be Congressmen. The Congress(I)'s attempts to prove that the Marxists were conspiring to discredit their party backfired when the second ransacking of their office, on June 8, was sought to be similarly explained.

The attackers had broken into the office, smashed furniture, tubelights, typewriters and telephones, while shouting slogans against Congress(I) leader Subrata Mukherjee. Briefing newsmen after the incident, party General Secretary Priya Ranjan Das Munshi declared that the attackers could not be Congressmen and that it was necessary to identify the "conspirators" who were trying to demoralise party workers. Without specifically naming any political party, Das Munshi hinted there was an "unholy force at work against the Congress", adding that the local police had come to scene only one-and-a-half hours after the incident.

The following day, however, Chief Minister Basu informed a press conference that the police had investigated the incident on its own since Panja and Das Munshi had refused to lodge any formal complaint. Of the five persons arrested by the police, in this connection, three were found to be "rebel" Congress(I) candidates—Sanjoy Upadhyay, Shankar Gupta and Vijay Kumar Pandey—from the Burrabazar district.

Other reports on the activities of the Congress(I) and its candidates were hardly more assuring: Vinod Prasad Singhania, a party worker and general secretary of the Burrabazar Chattra Parishad (students union) was arrested in connection with the recent bomb explosions in the area. Three live bombs and two bags of explosives were recovered from Singhania's residence.

Earlier, the Sovabazar Citizens Committee had complained against the local Congress(I) candidate, Tarak Banerjee, who was allegedly extorting money from local shopkeepers ever since his nomination. Banerjee and his gang, the committee alleged, regularly collected "subscriptions" from local vendors and forcibly occupied property in the area.

The impression that the state Congres(I) was inextricably linked with the city's underworld had, at any rate, been confirmed by Union Law Minister Asoke Sen's statement that the party leadership must remove anti-social elements from its ranks. Sen had bowed out of the civic poll scene, leaving behind an indelible stigma and a somewhat embarrassed Das Munshi, whose close links with the law minister are fairly common knowledge.

In an effort to demonstrate his solidarity with the state unit of the party, Das Munshi not only issued a statement dismissing the notion of the party list being full of anti-socials, but also averted a showdown between Subrata Mukherjee and two former general secretaries of the south Calcutta district committee—Pankaj Banerjee and Lakshmi Kanta Bose. Pankaj Banerjee, known to be a supporter of Asoke Sen, was dissuaded from holding a protest meeting and Das Munshi let it be known that henceforth he would work jointly with the two young party leaders, Somen Mitra and Subrata Mukherjee, in securing the party's success in the civic poll.

However, despite the brave attempts by the Congress(I) leaders to put up a facade of unity, the advantage remained with the Left Front. The Marxist line "Calcutta needs development not insults", plastered across walls all over the city, is yet to be countered. Left Front workers and leaders campaigning among the city's sizeable working class population point out that not only has the Congress(I) been unable to keep its promise of reopening sick and closed industrial units, but has done nothing to prevent the Centre from ruining the local railway wagon building industry. The recent announcements on the formation of a new power corporation, the signing of an agreement with R.P. Goenka for the long-awaited Haldia petrochemical unit, and several joint sector tie-ups in the field of electronics have created a picture of the Left Front trying hard to speed up industrial development without help from the Centre.

Rather than confronting these hard issues head-on, most Congress(I) leaders are continuing with their intrigues while publicly claiming that they are working jointly. The PCC(I) President, Pranab Mukherjee, confused party workers even more by holding discussions with Janata Party General Secretary George Fernandes. After the meeting Fernandes let drop a hint that the Congress(I) could break up, but the PCC(I) chief maintained a studied silence even after a number of newspaper reports suggested that the party high command did not know what had transpired at the meeting.

A number of Congress(I) leaders, realising Pranab Mukherjee's inability to control the party and concerned about Das Munshi's ascendence to prominence, have once again made a bid to rope in former West Bengal chief minister Siddhartha Shankar Ray. Past efforts to bring back Ray to the Congress(I) fold had failed largely because of the party high command's intransigence. But this time, surprisingly, the proposal to induct Ray for the civic poll campaigning, as a first step towards his political rehabilitation, has been okayed by the high command. Whether Ray's token appearance late in the campaign will make any difference to the party's chances in the poll is uncertain. What is certain, however, is the near-complete failure of the state Congress(I) to present a united challenge to the Marxists.

UTTAR PRADESH

House of Horror

YOG MAYA is a dark, attractive and intelligent woman with a rock-hard veneer that speaks eloquently of her unfortunate past. An orphan brought up in a remand home, she was raped at the age of seven and then thrown into the clutches of a perverted gang that specialised in making blue films. In 1977, she was one of a group of women married off by a prominent social worker. But little changed in her life. If anything, it became worse. The gang blackmailed her into making more films, posing for nude pictures and having sex with an increasing list of clients. Her husband, disgusted at her life-style, started beating her up at the slightest excuse. Pushed to the brink, she fought back last month by going to the police and naming the people in the gang. She then asked for protection and on May 4, at her own written request to a city magistrate, the tall iron gates of Lucknow's Women Protection Home, a government-run institution, opened to admit her as its 51st inmate. Within days of her arrival, the institution was in headline-grabbing turmoil and Yog Maya had suddenly acquired a new and far wider notoriety than ever before.

Photographs by S. PREMI

On May 24, less than three weeks after Maya's arrival, the entire lot of 51 inmates staged a dramatic strike by walking out en masse from the Home and filing a complaint with a city magistrate about their treatment. Till last week, 28 women were still missing. The catalyst for the turbulent events was, of course, Maya. A natural leader and, in her own words, "a born rebel" Maya quickly won the confidence of the other inmates and made them aware of their rights. "She was obviously used to a better life than us which is why she started protesting about the conditions in the Home," says one inmate.

There was obviously much to protest about. The Home actually consists of four small rooms where 51 women were crammed in like sardines. The rooms themselves were stinking, unhygienic cesspools with one dirty latrine. For bathing, a single tap out in the open in full view of the occupants of a building opposite. The inmates were treated like servants, poorly fed and punished frequently if they stepped out of line or complained. Officially, the Home gets a grant of Rs 1.66 lakh from the state Government each year for its running expenses. In fact, the sum spent on each inmate was a niggardly Rs 125 which included food, clothes and toiletries for the month. Many of the inmates are classified as psychological cases but there are no case records and treatment is either cursory or non-existent. Most of the inmates have similar backgrounds. They ran away from home because of unbearable conditions, fell into the clutches of pimps, escaped and then found themselves in the remand home where, they say, conditions were even worse. Says Meera Burman, 20: "Even hell must be better than this home." One indication is the fact that since March 1984, 12 girls have run away from it.

The last straw came when Maya, labelled a trouble-maker by those in charge of the home, was ordered transferred to a Home in Benaras. Already angered by the arbitrary decision, the dam burst when one of the inmates, Hameeda, fell ill with suspected cholera. She was not treated and when she arrived shivering and obviously seriously ill for the daily educational class, the teacher shouted at her and made her stand outside. Maya protested and after a heated exchange with the teacher, declared that she would also stand outside with Hameeda. The other inmates followed suit and marched up to the gates, locked them, and shouting slogans, disappeared towards the Hazratgunj Police Station. There they surrounded a magistrate and told him that they "preferred custody in jail to life in the Home".

They were persuaded to return and in reaction to the storm in the local press, the state's Minister for Social Welfare, Mrs Swaroop Kumari Bakshi, ironically enough the same prominent social worker who had arranged for Maya's ill-fated marriage, visited the Home and declared the situation to be normal. It was anything but. Three days after Bakshi's visit, 39 inmates fled the Home once again. The local administration launched an immediate hunt but a week after only 10 inmates had been found.

Bakshi, however, insists that a majority of the inmates are quite happy and were only instigated to rebellion by trouble-makers like Maya. But Maya, who has refused to be transferred to Benaras, denies any such role. "I did not call on them to revolt," she says, "the whole thing was quite spontaneous". The Social Welfare Department has now ordered an inquiry into the incidents at the Home but quite clearly nothing much will come of it. The attitude of the officials towards the inmates of the Home borders on callous indifference, nurtured by their knee-jerk belief that they are women of easy virtue, on par with criminals, led astray by the warped ambitions of Maya.

Swaroop Bakshi: differing note

But little or no heed is taken of the fact that the inmates are almost all victims of a cruel fate, homeless and without families and deserve understanding and affection rather than further deprivation and isolation. Maya herself offers the classic example. Says she: "Nobody could have gone through the hardships I did. I don't know who my parents were. I was raped when I was seven and beaten if I resisted. I realised then that I had to fight for everything."

Her marriage could have changed her life. Her husband, Chotey Lal, wanted to move to Hardoi but mysterious pressure was brought to bear on officials in charge of her rehabilitation to ensure that she remained in Lucknow. Says Chotey Lal: "We do not know why some people wanted us to stay on. I was even offerred a restaurant to run. I didn't know what was going on."

Maya was then lured into pornography by the offer of a film career. "One night, after the day's shooting, I was raped by four men. I was forced to pose naked in front of the camera and that was used to blackmail me. I was asked to sleep with more men every day." To escape their clutches, she went to the police with her story but only found herself plunged from one nightmare into another at the remand home. She has now asked to be released and plans to start life afresh. She is determined not to go back to her husband either. "But will anyone allow me to lead a peaceful life?" she asks plaintively. The police dismiss her and her complaints as not worthy of note while the Social Welfare Department views her as an evil that somehow must be got rid of quickly and with the least possible fuss to preserve the name of the Protection Home which, tragically, doesn't have very much of a name to preserve in the first place.

The loudest whisper

In bearings, it is silence that gets talked about most. And Jay bearings have proved it.

You can hear it all over the country — industrial users, stockists and retailers talking about the international quality at reasonable prices. The wide range. The immediate acceptance universally. The technical services, the national network of marketing offices and distribution outlets. And most important, the whisper quiet, smooth performance of Jay bearings.

The bearings are silent, but the acclaim is loud.

Another Great Idea.

VHS FVH D720 PAL/MESECAM

In 1937, a man named Avery Fisher had a great idea. He would introduce the world's very first high fidelity system. That idea and others that followed—video as well as audio—began a tradition of great ideas that still continues today at Fisher, the company he founded.

One great example: the VHS video cassette recorder shown above. It features a specially-developed, hybrid integrated circuit just one-tenth the size of a conventional IC. Plus a micron-precision video head, a product of Fisher's own fully-integrated manufacturing system.

Together, they provide Fisher video recorders with such extraordinarily high picture quality in virtually every playback mode—forward/reverse picture search, slow/quick motion and still/frame-by-frame—that it must be seen to be believed. With the addition of an 8-button, 11-function infrared remote control, you've got a system that ranks second to none.

One name is setting the standards for the "Audio-Video Age": Fisher. Don't you settle for less. Get yourself a great idea. Get yourself a Fisher.

Voltas technology

Voltas technology is geared for innovation. Because Voltas does not have to depend on hand-me-down technology from one single foreign associate. Voltas can directly avail of the best of the international market. These include Merlin Gerin, leading switchgear manufacturers; May & Christe, pioneers of the cast resin design transformers; Research Cottrell, leaders in air pollution control; and Ames Crosta Babcock, specialists in water pollution control.

It was Voltas which introduced Medium Voltage SF6 circuit breakers to India. These modern, low maintenance circuit breakers will be used by the Vizag Steel Plant, Chettinad and Priyadarshini Cements, Tata Electric, BEST and BSEB. This is the first time SF6 switchgear at medium voltage will be used in cement and steel plants.

Along with superior technology, Voltas has the kind of commitment which starts at the top. A management attitude that filters down along the line, creating the ability to solve problems, execute the most exacting tasks, all within a tight time framework.

Combined with capability backed by sophisticated manufacturing facilities and quality control techniques. With dedicated professionals that form a power house of 200 trained engineers and 1800 support personnel. With the experience to put together individual products or complete turnkey projects.

Voltas technology, capability and commitment together form the kind of winning combination that has been proven time and again. With a single goal before us.

Your confidence is our most important goal.

CONGRESS(I)

Remote Rule

A SIGNIFICANT change seems to have occurred in the relationship between the prime minister and Congress(I) chief ministers in the various states. Unlike his mother, who encouraged state leaders to meet her frequently, Rajiv Gandhi has consciously discouraged state party unit chiefs and chief ministers from rushing to Delhi on any excuse to "pay their respects to their beloved leader". Barring a few exceptions, in his six months in office Rajiv has not met any chief minister alone more than four times. Though they continue to descend on Delhi almost twice a month, the chief ministers' requests for appointments are rarely conceded due to the "other pressing engagements of the prime minister".

Rajiv was not always so distant. Soon after he assumed office he gave appointments liberally to all the chief ministers and party leaders in order to size them up personally and establish a working rapport with them. At that time he gave them specific directions to concentrate on strengthening state organisations and to streamline lethargic administrations. State leaders were also told they should not depend on the high command for every decision and must decide matters on their own—though major policy decisions should only be taken after consultation with the Central leadership. Said AICC(I) General Secretary Rajendra Kumari Bajpai: "Rajivji insisted on decentralisation of the decision making process."

But the faction-ridden Congress(I) was not geared for such a major change. Soon after the assembly elections, almost all the 17-odd Congress(I) chief ministers and their hangers-on began their usual pilgrimages to Delhi to seek the support of the 'new power centres'. In March alone over a dozen Congress(I) chief ministers visited Delhi at least twice and spent an average of 10 days each in the capital. Many of them could not meet the prime minister, and had to be satisfied with meetings with Arun Nehru, Arun Singh or M.L. Fotedar. Their visits, as one chief minister put it, "were to ensure that no backbiting was being done by our detractors in New Delhi" and that their version of events was also put to the prime minister.

Interestingly, most of the chief ministers who were making regular jaunts to Delhi were those who had assumed office during Rajiv's ascendancy in Congress(I) politics. Shiv Charan Mathur of Rajasthan, for example, spent every fourth day in Delhi before he left office. He was followed closely by Uttar Pradesh's Narain Dutt Tiwari, who spent half of his last six months in office in Delhi. But soon Rajiv became more selective, and many chief ministers found they had longer waits before their requests for a meeting were passed on. Four of them even went through the ignominy of leaving Delhi without a meeting. Vasantrao Patil was one who could not see Rajiv at his convenience; his answer was his recent resignation (see page 21).

Another reason for Rajiv's reluctance to meet the chief ministers could be that except for Himachal Pradesh Chief Minister Virbhadra Singh and Madhya Pradesh's Moti Lal Vora, none of the others owe their position to him. Unlike Sanjay, whose manipulations after the 1980 assembly elections brought into prominence men like Gundu Rao and Antulay, Rajiv has been less domineering. Few of his known loyalists have been made chief ministers.

Rajiv was similarly unintrusive during the selection of Vasantrao Patil's successor in Maharashtra. "Rajivji favours consensus and not imposition in state politics," says AICC(I) General Secretary G.K. Moopanar. Moopanar's view is based on the fact that since Rajiv's induction into politics only 10 Congress(I) chief ministers have been replaced. But all of them were chosen by the state legislature party and not one was known as a Rajiv protegé. Rajiv supported the drafting of Patil into Maharashtra politics after Babasaheb Bhosale's departure because he was a consensus candidate.

But some chief ministers feel Rajiv's remote attitude really reflects his inability to adjust with them politically. They say he is more amenable to his own appointees like Virbhadra Singh and Vora. And some of their supporters accuse the prime minister's aides of favouritism. But the prime minister's office denies there is any discrimination.

Party sources say Rajiv has rejected some requests of a primarily political nature because he does not want to encourage factionalism by giving the impression he encourages any particular group. In the last few months he has been searching for new PCC(I) chiefs who are not only acceptable to the chief ministers but also capable of sorting out petty political problems at their own level. In choosing PCC(I) presidents for Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, Madhya Pradesh and Gujarat he accepted the recommendations of the chief ministers so that there would be a harmonious relationship between the executive and the party. At the same time, he has made it clear that the PCC(I)'s will have an elevated status in relation to the state governments.

But a setback for Rajiv's plan to decentralise party operations ensued when he chose nonentities as presidents of the various PCC(I)'s. Few of them are known for their organisational capabilities. Worse, the selection of relatively weak PCC(I) chiefs has encouraged dissidents to come out in the open because they are not finding any effective state-level politician to redress their grievances. Said a dissident leader of Madhya Pradesh: "There is continuity in at least one respect; no local leader is being allowed to consolidate himself in the state. The high command is doing this by keeping old chief ministers at a distance and appointing rootless politicians as party chiefs." If he is right, Rajiv will have a hard time distancing himself from the petty details of state politics.

Amitabh Bachchan

Sant Bux Singh was not alone in this campaign...regardless of whether it is a conspiracy or not the attack has left Bachchan in an unenviable position.

Sant Bux Singh

AMITABH BACHCHAN

Playing a Double Role

FOR ONCE last fortnight Amitabh Bachchan, the invincible avenger of Hindi films, was caught off-guard. What started as a catchy headline in a newspaper interview swelled into a full-throated political controversy that questioned not only Bachchan's motivations as a member of Parliament but was proof of the fact that flip dialogue can do more damage in public life than on the screen.

It all began with what looked like a rather benign interview in the Sunday magazine section of The Times of India where Bachchan waxed eloquent on his personal relationship with Rajiv Gandhi and described, almost philosophically, how he had been "flown from Bangalore and dumped into the cesspool of politics". The observation was obviously disliked by men who, unlike Bachchan, have made a profession of politics.

The retaliation came belatedly, but when it came it hit Bachchan with telling effect. Sant Bux Singh, elder brother of Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh and former MP, has, over the years, acquired a reputation for outspokenness in Congress(I) circles. And now he launched a broadside at Bachchan, accusing him of name dropping, ignoring Allahabad and spending his time in supervising construction of his house in Delhi. "My point is clear," Sant Bux Singh, a former Hindustan Lever planning manager, told INDIA TODAY : "I objected to his calling my city a dumpheap, of misusing my leader's name and maligning my profession." His two-page rejoinder to Bachchan ended rather harshly, saying, "If Mr Bachchan finds politics a cesspool why doesn't he leave it and make it less stagnant?"

Singh says when his friends showed him the Bachchan interview his initial reaction was to merely write a rejoinder in the letters columns of The Times of India. "But they said they will take a week publishing it and since some of my friends had already seen the statement it became public." He says he had not anticipated that this will blow up into such a major controversy. But it could have hardly been otherwise. V.P. Singh is considered the most powerful minister in the Cabinet and is believed to be close to his elder brother. It was thus natural that the motivations for Sant Bux Singh's attack were laid at his brother's door.

The Uttar Pradesh unit of the Youth Congress(I) stoutly came out in Bachchan's defence, accusing V.P.Singh of launching an indirect campaign against him. A newly formed Amitabh fans' association threatened to demonstrate in front of V.P. Singh's house. Even Rajendra Kumari Bajpai, one of the AICC (I) general secretaries, joined Bachchan's defence saying that Sant Bux Singh was attacking him at the behest of his "old friend" Hemwati Nandan Bahuguna. Sant Bux Singh, however, dismisses it all contemptuously, asking, "Why should I talk of the Youth Congress and give them undue importance? And wasn't Rajendri (as Rajendra Kumari Bajpai is popularly known) herself an election agent of Bahuguna's once?"

V.P. Singh came out in Bachchan's support openly and dissociated himself from his brother's diatribe. Yet Sant Bux Singh was not alone in this campaign. He is most certainly backed by an influential section within the Uttar Pradesh Congress (I), particularly those hailing from Allahabad even though he denied any suggestion of a conspiracy arguing, "Why should there be a conspiracy against Bachchan? Does he constitute any political force? What difference does it make to the party whether he stays in politics or goes back to films?"

Regardless of whether it is a conspiracy or not, the attack has left Bachchan in an unenviable position. Film grapevine has, for some time, been trumpeting his return. Prakash Mehra, who made Bachchan a superstar with Zanzeer has been loudly proclaiming that the superstar is returning to films and talk of his quitting is "crap".

Bachchan has not denied this though he made a weak attempt last fortnight to defend his record in politics. Making his first public speech, he said in Pune that he had been permitted by the prime minister and H.K.L. Bhagat, the parliamentary affairs minister, to remain absent from Parliament. And as for Allahabad, he promised he would hold premiere shows for all his films and spend the money collected on development projects in his constituency.

If Bachchan indeed has plans to return to films, the new controversy is likely to queer his pitch for now there are demands on him from loyalists within the party to disprove his critics. And his statements in Pune indicated that he was taking up the challenge. But the film industry is still bound to beckon and chances are that the most popular hero of the Indian silver screen will have to contend with playing the role of a split personality in his personal life.

TAMIL NADU

Silent Rule

FOR YEARS Tamil Nadu Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran opened all his public speeches with a single magic phrase: En rathathin rathamana udan pirappukkale (blood of my blood, my fellow human beings). The phrase that moved a million Tamils is missing now, but MGR is still creating magic—ever since he returned to life from the jaws of death, he has been ruling his state without being able to speak. "It is a miracle," confided a top state police officer, "in fact, if anything MGR's illness and the medical treatment he received seem to have made his mind sharper."

For a few tense months, though, following MGR's stroke in October last, it was thought that the beloved chief minister was permanently lost to the state. His mental faculties seemed to have been affected and many said as much. During the campaign for the legislative assembly elections held in December, DMK President M. Karunanidhi openly doubted MGR's mental fitness to rule again and even the chief minister's own political heiress Jayalalitha Jayaram, when she was dethroned as deputy leader of the AIADMK Parliamentary Party, expressed doubts publicly whether MGR was fully aware of all that was happening.

But MGR has stunned everyone. He came back from New York, took oath of office, made a conscious two-stage selection of his cabinet and settled himself firmly in the saddle of power. From there he ruled like never before, without words but with a mind that was functioning sharply and clearly. He reshuffled people in the Government, restored Director-General of Police (intelligence) K. Mohandas to his powerful post. He promoted seven deputy inspector generals of police to the inspector general level, and he constituted a three-member committee to scrutinise the cases of his 80-odd partymen who had been expelled from the party during his convalescence.

A new side of MGR emerged. He began going to his secretariat office in the mornings, something he rarely did before his illness. In the evenings he pondered over his files at home, and to top it all, he even led a team of Tamil Nadu government officials to New Delhi last fortnight to negotiate a difficult increase in the state's seventh plan outlay—and succeeded where the state Finance Minister V.R. Nedunchezhiyan had failed. Said Dr Prathap C. Reddy, chairman of the private Apollo Hospitals in Madras city: "MGR has got a phenomenal will to live."

So phenomenal, in fact, is that will, the MGR has overcome many handicaps that would have permanently crippled a lesser man. In February, when he came back from New York, he could write only very shakily with his right hand and that too by holding it with his left. Now, a few months later, MGR is writing with a steady hand and more than ever before. Said a government official: "He now makes copious notes on files concerning very simple matters."

MGR at an all-party meeting: speechless admiration

Still, how does a chief minister communicate with his people? If MGR with his voice was amazing, MGR without his voice is more startling still. Said C. Kandappan, DMK organising secretary: "While he is able to speak only few words, he is able to generally communicate his feelings by signalling."

Through his gestures and a few broken words, MGR has even been conducting cabinet meetings. A minister revealed how he did this: "The chief minister would walk in slowly on the dot, bow, and take his seat. Discussions would start on the subjects listed on the agenda. MGR would listen attentively, and occasionally make gestures. He would sometimes whisper into a neighbour's ear, who would convey what the chief minister desired to say."

The public has not been denied its hero either. Every morning, MGR appears outside his residence and grants audience to his fans, admirers as well as people with grievances. He touches his heart and blesses and waves to them to assure them that he will look after their needs. If he does not understand what his people want, he shakes a closed fist in a gesture for clarification Said S.K. Uthaman, a cinema theatre owner, and one of MGR's morning visitors last week: "Decades ago MGR had worked for my uncle who was a film producer, and I haven't met the chief minister for ages. But he spotted me in a jiffy, smiled at me and assured me by waving his hand that he would look into my problem."

Through gestures, the chief minister has not only been able to actively take part in official meetings, but also set to rest any doubts on his mental ability.

He asked his general secretary to dissolve the parliamentary board, initiated a membership drive and modified party rules. So, government and party files continue to move and the wheels of administration seem to be running smoothly despite MGR's serious speech defect. If anything, precisely because he can't speak much, MGR has become quicker and sharper at his job. Said a top government official: "Earlier the chief minister used to vacillate on every important issue. He wouldn't take a decision on any matter till the last minute. But now he is very fast. He listens very carefully when you bring up a file, and gives an order immediately."

For the people of Tamil Nadu it has been a miracle, no less. And for the amazed men of medicine as well. Said a speech therapist treating MGR now: "Normally if a stroke patient loses his speech, whatever part of the speech faculty he recovers has to be regained within six months. After that there will be little hope for any improvement. But in the chief minister's case there is still steady progress even though the six months' deadline elapsed on April 13." M.G. Ramachandran, it seems, is back—and back to stay.

NTR addressing Telugu Desam meeting on his birthday: power crisis

ANDHRA PRADESH

An Erratic Course

IT WAS N.T. Rama Rao's birthday, and gathered at his "Shanti Kuteeram Ashram" home were Telugu Desam MP's, MLA's, zilla parishad chairmen, panchayat samiti presidents and other members of the party's central council. But this was no birthday bash. So close is the identification between NTR and his party that since its inception, major meetings of the Telugu Desam have taken place on his birthday and it came as no surprise this time when he announced that the permanent headquarters of the party would be located in the backyard of Shanti Kuteeram.

On a more serious level the meeting was, ostensibly, to review the policies and programmes of the party and their implementation. But the most important task of the meet was to push through a change in the party constitution authorising NTR to handpick a 26-member executive committee and then choose party office-bearers from among them. NTR denied that his new powers meant centralisation of authority and were contrary to the democratic spirit. "The system of nomination of executive members would ensure adequate representation to all sections in the party, which would not be possible in an election as the new general body will have about 40,000 people," he said.

NTR's stand on the subject is a change from his view in 1983. That year the party's central council had authorised him to name the executive, and when asked to comment about the selection rather than election of that body he had pleaded: "When they ask me to nominate it I cannot say I will not." The change in response to the same issue in two years is a symptom of his attempt to come to grips with the realities of building an effective party machine and run an efficient government.

At the same time that he was centralising power in the party, NTR was moving to decentralise the administration in order to make it more efficient. In a shake-up of the rural power structure last month he created 1,104 revenue mandals in place of the 305 taluks and 1,084 firkas. The change-over was not smooth, with the locations of the mandal headquarters—each reaching out to six or seven villages with populations ranging from 3,500 to 55,000—and the posting of their staff giving rise to controversy. Panchayat Raj Minister K.R. Rao did not turn up for a function in his constituency of Medak as villagers had gathered there to protest the choice of a neighbouring village for the mandal headquarters. In Mahbubnagar the police had to open fire at a crowd of villagers protesting against the choice of a neighbouring village, killing one of them.

Still, revenue mandals are here to stay and, consequently, further changes in the party structure are in the offing. A pyramidical structure with four tiers—comprising village committees, mandal committees, district committees and the state committee—is being planned so that the different tiers of the party are parallel to the new administrative hierarchy. The existing panchayat samitis will be replaced with mandal samitis by the end of the year.

It was during his temporary unseating last year that NTR realised a party structure with active members was essential. Wiser by that experience he had two training camps organised in May to train hardcore activists to help enlist members in the villages and explain to them the programmes and policies of the Telugu Desam. His son-in-law, Chandrababu Naidu, has been in charge of picking the activists and training them. "Our interest is to take a fresh crop of people interested in grassroots politics and not those coming from the Congress for one reason or the other."

Ironically, Naidu himself was a Congress(I) minister who lost in the 1983 assembly elections but displayed remarkable opportunism by defecting to the Telugu Desam a fortnight after the results were announced. NTR stifled the opposition to Naidu in his party at that time and made Naidu's entry easy. Naidu kept a low profile at first, but in August last year, when NTR was removed, he began taking a greater interest in party affairs and rose to be the closest aide of the chief minister. In fact his conspicuous presence at the birthday meeting, with party activists fawning over him, made one delegate remark: "This is the son-in-law's convention, and not a party meeting."

Venkateshwara Rao (top) and Chandrababu Naidu

Naidu denies any interest in office but the family plot thickens when it is noticed that another son-in-law of NTR, D. Venkateshwara Rao, who has been with the party since its inception, has been sidelined. The low profile Venkateshwara Rao was responsible for NTR's itinerary in the formative months of the Telugu Desam. And if Naidu becomes general secretary, as sources say is likely, then some partymen may range behind Venkateshwara Rao and sow the seeds of a rift within the party. NTR has not categorically ruled out Naidu becoming general secretary and the intra-party tussle is likely to grow after the executive is nominated by him in September.

But the man most disenchanted with NTR's style of functioning is Ramoji Rao, the editor of Eenadu. The paper's backing helped NTR during the crucial campaign for the 1983 assembly poll and the Eenadu group is usually identified as pro-Telugu Desam. Rao is especially critical of NTR's backtracking on several earlier decisions. "We supported NTR to cleanse the political system in Andhra but he is going astray and arrogating powers to himself, the very reason for which we fought against Mrs Gandhi. He inspires confidence in the people but is not willing to delegate responsibility. This is a danger to democracy and my obligation is not to him, but to the people who read us every morning."

He has cause for complaint. After the pull-back on the mid-day meal scheme and on the retirement age limit, NTR decided to restore the Rs 50 a month pension scheme for legislators, which he had scrapped a month after coming to office. Last fortnight he lifted the ban on inter-district sale of paddy, supposedly to ensure remunerative prices for farmers by stimulating purchases by millers and other agencies. Earlier, he had been all for the ban, arguing that millers were exploiting the paddy growers.

As for the bureaucrats, many consider NTR their bete noire. NTR soured relations with them for the second time when he suddenly transferred two secretaries to the Government. Most bureaucrats in the state recall the regime of chief minister Vengala Rao as the "golden era of administration in Andhra." And says Vengala Rao, who is now president of the state Congress(I) committee: "NTR needs a ministry for abolitions. Most of the significant decisions made by the Telugu Desam government are the abolition or scrapping of one decision or the other." The most dramatic NTR turnabout has been on the vexatious question of Centre-state relations. The final memorandum he presented to the Sarkaria Commission on June 12 seems considerably watered down, arguing forcefully only that the institution of governor be abolished. As for his much publicised demand that the Centre fund all massive irrigation and power projects, he now asks only that they "be liberally funded by national resources." Significantly, the memorandum is silent about vital issues like appointments of judges and the powers of the legislature.

Also chipping away at NTR's popularity are the new taxes he is planning to impose to help make-up the budgetary deficit of Rs 257 crore, which will be even larger when the annual budget is presented to the Assembly in June. NTR even finds that political parties friendly with him during his ouster are now drifting away. Though sitting pretty with a massive mandate, the increasing criticism seems to show that NTR had better grapple with the problems of government in a more decisive manner.

KERALA

Short Circuiting

THERE is never a dull moment in Kerala politics. The latest crisis was triggered by a supposedly seditious speech delivered by electricity minister Balakrishna Pillai of the Kerala Congress at the Cochin convention of his party. The affair soon developed into open strife between the Congress(I) and the Kerala Congress over Centre-state relations and the state economy and threatened to break up their three-year-old alliance in the ruling United Democratic Front (UDF). But that eventuality was staved off by Pillai's resigning from his portfolio and both the Youth Congress and the Kerala Youth Front of the Kerala Congress calling off their agitations.

Pillai had called for a Punjab-style agitation in Kerala to force the Centre to grant the state justice. Though later he hotly denied having said any such thing, the Congress(I) was enraged. The Youth Congress conducted angry demonstrations against him and demanded his dismissal. G. Karthikeyan, Youth Congress president, said Pillai's statements were "clearly seditious", and egged on by Karunakaran, KPCC(I) President V. Padmarajan said it would be virtually impossible for his party to "go forward with any organisation determined to launch an anti-Centre agitation."

But the tiff soon took on larger dimensions, for the Congress(I) also launched a bitter attack on Kerala Congress strongman and state Finance Minister K.M. Mani. Mani was accused of messing up the state's economy. Said M.M. Jacob, the powerful Congress(I) MP from the state: "This man Mani has played havoc with the state's finances by the way he has formulated his budgets during the last six years. They have only helped certain people who are his party's vote banks." Adds Karthikeyan: "The Central Travancore districts of Kottayam, Idukki and Pathanamthitta are the only districts to benefit from Mani's budgets." Simmering resentment over crucial ministries being held by the Kerala Congress also boiled over. "In the last three years where development work or contact with the masses was concerned it was through finance, revenue, electricity and education, and all these were held by the Kerala Congress," says Youth Congress MLA P. Sudhakaran. "Ideologically we drifted apart months back but the patchwork coalition will survive for some time," he adds.

Mani was quick to refute the charges. "The Congress(I) is showing arrogance by characterising our attempt to get our rights from the Centre as anti-Centre." He reeled out statistics to show that Kerala's seventh plan outlay was only 20 per cent higher than for the sixth plan, while the increase in other southern states ruled by the Opposition was more than 55 per cent. He was firm in his belief that the Finance Commission had done harm to the state. Indeed, Kerala had a financial surplus of Rs 65 crore in the 1980-81 financial year, which has now turned into a deficit of Rs 300 crore. But whether that is Mani's or the Centre's fault is yet to be proved.

After the series of skirmishes it was widely accepted that the Congress(I) had emerged with more public sympathy than the Kerala Congress. Admitted an MLA close to Mani: "Our image has been tarnished." It was now that Karunakaran played his hand. He is said to have instigated K.C. Chandy, Congress(I) activist and son of Madhya Pradesh Governor K.M. Chandy, an old antagonist of Mani, to file a "quo warranto" writ petition against Pillai for having made a seditious speech. The matter came to a head the very next day. Admitting the writ petition, Justice Radhakrishna Menon

'I will continue to fight'

HE IS controversial and brash; he is rich; he is the sole Hindu Nair leader in the predominantly Christian Kerala Congress; he has the maximum number of cases filed against him; to the CPI(M) "he is a demon" but his wife says he is a "thoroughly misunderstood person"; though a minister he even acted in a film and is reputed to have the best collection of video films in Trivandrum. He is Balakrishna Pillai, who was holding the electricity portfolio before his resignation last fortnight.

Born into a prosperous land-owning family in Kottarakara, 75 km from Trivandrum, ("My father was the richest man in Quilon district and I am his only son," he had said once), he started off as a communist student leader, switched to the Congress and in 1965 founded the Kerala Congress with mentor P.T. Chacko.

In 1959, when barely 25, he won the assembly seat from Kottarakara, becoming the youngest ever MLA in the Kerala Assembly. Says wife Valsala: "People in Kottarakara are simply crazy about their beloved Balan (his pet name)." Others disagree.

As electricity minister for five years, he had broken the back of the powerful CPI and CPI(M) unions in the board. When he resigned, the communist unions celebrated with sweets. Says M.O. Habib, the powerful union leader: "That man was running the board as his personal fiefdom."

When the Silent Valley project was scrapped, he had said that "thousands of young unemployed men have been sacrificed for the sake of a few monkeys". When poetess and environmentalist Sugathakumari had criticised ministers for killing people by speeding on the state's narrow roads Pillai had retorted that somebody should send Kumari abroad to places where drivers would be fined for going slower than 150 km per hour. Says Valsala: "My husband, unlike other politicians, talks freely." Pillai spoke to Trivandrum Correspondent SREEDHAR PILLAI about his controversial Cochin speech which led to his resignation. Karunakaran (left) at the UDF liaison meeting: still confident took legal circles in the state by storm when he remarked that Pillai should have stepped down the moment the petition was admitted. There is no precedent for a judge making such remarks at that stage. Legal circles pointed out that it was extraordinary for the court to make such remarks before even getting the reply of the respondent to the notice. But this gave Pillai a chance to resign without being eased out. However, the Kerala Congress' troubles were not over. Another petition was filed in the court seeking the removal of not only Pillai but all the other three Kerala Congress members from the Assembly on grounds of sedition.

At the end of it all, there was no doubt that the Congress(I) had come off better after the skirmish. Said Sudhakaran: "The resignation of Pillai has made heroes of Youth Congress men all over the state." Even opposition MLA's congratulated the Congress(I) for humbling the Kerala Congress. As E.M.S. Namboodiripad said: "We haven't forgotten the defection of Mani and the Kerala Congress which brought down the Nayanar ministry."

The options for the Kerala Congress were not so promising. But already there are moves to mend its fences with the opposition Left Democratic Front. Mani, who wants the Kerala Congress to become a regional party like the Telugu Desam, is trying to bring all communal parties in the state under one umbrella and float a third front. And Pillai has already begun moves to woo the powerful Nairs by accusing Karunakaran of being responsible for the Nair-dominated National Democratic Party being without a seat in the Assembly due to the resignation of health minister Ramachandran Nair (INDIA TODAY, June 15).

But the biggest hurdle stopping Mani and the Kerala Congress from breaking away from the UDF is the church. The Pope is almost certain to visit Mani's constituency of Palai, a Catholic citadel, when he visits Kerala in 1986. The church is keen that at that time the Kerala Congress should not be allied with the atheist CPI(M) and its supporters. Says Sudhakaran: "Mani would very much like to be in the helicopter that takes the Pope to Palai for a religious function."

Karunakaran remains smug about the prospects for his coalition. The liaison committee of the UDF met in Trivandrum and a temporary truce was thrashed out. But the Kerala Congress, though now licking its wounds, is bound to be more assertive in the future. It has made it clear that it will continue to voice its concern over what it perceives as neglect of the state by the Centre. At present, one of the periodic truces that mark politics in Kerala is on. But as for the the future, it is anybody's guess. —SREEDHAR PILLAI

Q. What made you say that Kerala could certainly think of a "Punjab model agitation" against the Centre?

A. I have already denied the report and have said that I have made no such statement. The press has misquoted me.

Q. But the pressmen covering your party's convention have reiterated their stand and Congress(I) people claim they have tapes of your speech and the chief minister was not happy with your clarifications?

A. The report was a misinterpretation. I oppose the agitation in Punjab. I detest it and both the chief minister and the governor are satisfied with my explanation. Regarding the tapes, let the Congress(I) make it public.

Q. Don't you agree that your political career is finished and the Congress(I) has painted you as an anti-national?

A. I will continue to do political work until my death and my trade union activities give me more pleasure than being a minister. As for the Congress(I) campaign against me, time will prove my innocence.

Q. A Congress(I) man filed a writ petition against you and there is an anti-Pillai wave unleashed by the Youth Congress(I).

A. There is a well orchestrated campaign within the ruling front to see me out of politics, because I am not prepared to play ball with them in the manner they want me to. I will continue to fight against injustice heaped upon Kerala from various quarters.

Q. There is a move by certain people inside the Kerala Congress to ditch you and drive you out of the party.

A. It is totally baseless, my party stood with me through the crisis and we have come out with our honour intact.

Q. But the Congress(I) leaders are gloating over the fact that they have humbled you and your party who have been spearheading the movement against the Centre.

A. The Congress(I) is trying to suppress our voice asking for the state's legitimate rights. This trend if unchecked would force millions of young men and women of the state to remain unemployed. The attempt to silence our expression of these sentiments and to brand us as traitors has become a dangerous fashion with them. The Kerala Congress will definitely fight against these forces at the right time. All I said at Cochin was that the proposed railway coach factory was taken away from Kerala to Punjab. Is it anti-national to speak for Kerala's rights?

Q. What about your future relationship with the Congress(I)?

A. My party will decide about it. But for the present I have to fight my case in court. Let me tell you that the people of Kerala are behind me. For the time being I will stay on in Kottarakara, at least till I win my case.

NAGALAND

Fighting for Control

A STRANGE battlefield exists 308 km south-east of Guwahati. It stretches over 400 km and has all but one of the elements that make for war between two neighbouring countries. There are rocket launchers, three-inch mortars and medium machine-guns, sandbagged machine gun nests and bunkers, prisoners of war, a no man's land and even neutral forces to keep the trigger-happy troops of warring forces away from each other. The sole missing element in this scenario is an international border.

What happened around Merapani, a small village in Doyang reserve forest along the disputed border tracts between Assam and Nagaland was fratricide at its worst. In a series of clashes that began on the evening of June 4, just when the respective commissioners of the two states were discussing steps to defuse tension along the border, the entire Merapani Bazar was reduced to debris, the Assam police station destroyed, over 27,000 villagers rendered destitute in the conglomeration of settlements around Merapani and—even on conservative estimates—at least 40 people, 30 of them policemen were left dead and over a hundred wounded. And late last fortnight despite the presence of the Assam Rifles, a neutral force under Union Home Ministry control and two "summit" meetings between the chief ministers of the two states, sporadic incidents of arson and assault on civilians continued and brought senior Central officials including Minister of State for Home Affairs, Ram Dulari Sinha, rushing to the region. But after sitting through series of mediation sessions all Mrs Sinha could say, with a bit of optimism, was, "they have both assured me that this will not happen again. Whatever happened was very unfortunate and a result of provocation from both sides." The two state governments, however, were squarely laying the blame on each other's door.

Nagaland authorities claim the tension began to build when the Assam Forest Department decided to construct a checkpost a little ahead of the Merapani police station close to the foothills in Wokha district inhabited by Lotha Nagas. "This was a violation of the 1972 agreement between Assam and Nagaland on maintaining status in disputed areas and rendered thousands of Naga people homeless, provoking them," says Wodemo Bhandari, an official of Wokha district. The Assamese on the other hand claim that the attack from the Nagaland side was totally unprovoked and merely a culmination of provocations that began over a month ago with frequent assaults on civilians. It was in view of these tensions that the commissioners accompanied by senior police and civil officials from the two states met at Dimapur in the evening promising to maintain peace on their respective sides and to resume negotiations at a flag meeting near Merapani the following morning. But within minutes of the meeting the Assam Armed Police units at Merapani came under deadly fire.

Survivors of the raid say that the Naga Armed Police units perched on the hills and poured fire downwards with deadly accuracy. Medium machine-guns and three-inch mortars as well as rocket launchers were used to blast the few tunells in which the demoralised Assam police jawans had taken refuge.

The fusillade continued all night and yet on the morning of June 5, P.V. Sumant, deputy inspector general of police (DIG) Jorhat range, decided to go for the flag meeting at the appointed hour. He had to retreat in a bit of a hurry as his jeep, the white flag notwithstanding, came under heavy fire. After that the Nagaland police pulled out all stops, launching a frontal assault on Assam police positions, slaughtering anything, man or beast, that came in their way. So complete was the destruction that five days later, Ram Dulari Sinha returned from a visit to the place almost in tears, loudly complaining of being sick of the stench rising from putrefying bodies of cattle. The entire Merapani Bazar, police station and the house of residents who fled in panic, were ransacked as hundreds of Naga civilians descended on the area following the Nagaland police victory.

The Nagaland Government's version on the other hand is that fighting broke out when the deputy commissioner of Wokha riding a jeep with a white flag was attacked. The Nagas also blame the Assam police for the large number of casualties suffered by them. Said T. Ngullie, Nagaland finance minister and himself a Lotha Naga: "These Assam policemen commit suicide. They had been eating up parts of Naga territory and coming closer to the foothills which is so wrong strategically because even if the Naga police throws a stone down it will hit the Assamese." He, however, hastens to add that what happened was a case of "brother-killing-brother" and thus unfortunate. Added Chief Minister S. Chubatoshi Jamir: "Whatever happened was wrong but provocation came from the Assamese side."

But while it is impossible to fix blame in such situations there in no doubting the much greater belligerence on the Nagaland side. Just a few hours before

Ram Dulari Sinha's visit an Assam Government ambulance in search for the dead and wounded was attacked and burnt and a wooden bridge on the road leading to Merapani blown up. Assam Rifles officers unnerved by the crisis were advising senior Assam police officers to come to the area only in civvies.

Continuing tension and incidents were only adding to the embarrassment of the Centre where, in the prime minister's absence, there had been initial hesitation in dealing with the situation firmly. But Mrs Sinha, in separate meetings, conveyed the same emphatic message to the two chief ministers, that no matter what happened the Centre could hardly afford to spare its paramilitary forces for policing an inter-state border at a point of time when Punjab and Gujarat required the utmost attention and deployment of all available troops. But officials were sceptical of the possibility of lasting peace. Said one: "There can be no peace in this area until the border problem is decisively solved and the Nagaland Government convinced that it has to behave like any other state in India and not a sovereign entity. They are not even offering to take action against police officers who organised the raid." Officials also said that clashes raised other vital points. The state armed police forces are not issued three-inch mortars, medium machine-guns and rocket launchers yet these were used freely in the attack.

Policemen and Assam Rifles troops keeping at bay fleeing villagers

SHEKHAR GUPTA

It is suspected that these were brought in with the complicity of some of the men in the Border Security Force battalions largely dominated by ex-underground Naga elements.

IN FACT sources do not even rule out the direct involvement of the Naga underground and trace the origins of the incident back to the capture of five Naga student leaders in a Jorhat hotel on April 5. They were seen carrying two shot-guns, secessionist literature, a letter from an organisation called International Working Group on Indigenous Affairs in Copenhagen offering support to the Naga separatist demands and a map showing the major Assam police outposts in the disputed Assam-Nagaland border area. Most vitally, the group was riding a jeep number NLP 1549 belonging to a DIG of Nagaland police. The Assam Government had reported the incident to the Centre along with a complaint that some Naga police officials were threatening to take revenge in case the students and the jeep were not released immediately.

But this could at best be an immediate provocation for a long-standing dispute which has claimed many lives in the last decade. On January 5, 1979, three days after the then Assam chief minister Golap Borbora and Nagaland chief minister Vizol signed a peace accord, Naga villagers aided by police descended on the Chungajan Tinali (tri junction) area and slaughtered 57 Assamese villagers. Since then tension has prevailed along the disputed region consisting of the seven reserve forests of Diphu, south Nambor, Rengma, Doyang, Kakadanga, Dessci and Abhaypur and in spite of the presence of CRPF and Assam Rifles in the more sensitive areas incidents have taken place off and on. Following the Chungajan Tinali massacre the Centre has set up a commission headed by K.V.K. Sundaram which upheld Assam's claims over all but 300 of the over 40,000 sq km of the reserve forest area. "Let them implement the commission's report or set up a new commission," says Assam Chief Minister Hiteswar Saikia, arguing "we Assamese did not object to the carving out of Nagaland, Meghalaya, Arunachal Pradesh and Mizoram from our state. What problems can we have with giving a little territory to one of these states if it was not ours. But someone has to tell me which is my territory and which is not." Mrs Sinha indicated that both sides were agreeable to the setting up of yet another commission but her pitch was queered by the categorical statement from Nagaland officials that nothing short of total control over the forest reserves will be acceptable to them. "This land always belonged to the Nagas in history. The Sundaram Commission was no commission and there can be no solution unless all our lands are given to us," said Ngullie shortly before he left for Delhi on urgent summons from the party high command.

While the Congress(I) high command is desperately trying to restrain its men in Nagaland, Central officials say a long-term accord is unlikely since the problem which was initially of strong political significance in both states also has an economic dimension. With the destruction of forests in the region a number of plywood factories along the foothills are starved for supplies and unscrupulous loggers frequently poach into the forest reserves with the connivance of Naga officials. Naga occupation of the region will make things that much easier. The Nagas say the boot is on the other leg and that the Assam officials have plundered the forest wealth by settling over 8,000 tribals and former tea-garden labourers in the forest reserves to show physical occupation of the area. This has been further complicated by the discovery of oil in the area. Nagaland claims special rights over its mineral wealth by virtue of its special status under Article 371 of the Constitution and proposes to set up its own agency for oil prospecting in the region. The state Assembly has also unanimously passed a resolution asking the ONGC to keep its hands off the area. The ONGC has stopped the work for the time being.

In both states this has become an emotional issue. The Assamese harbour a long-standing sense of hurt at the pampering of neighbouring hill states at their expense and the Nagas think oil and timber in the reserve forest area will revolutionise their state's incipient economy. Assam students protested by organising a day's bandh.

Late last week indications were that the Centre was awaiting the return of the prime minister before taking decisive action on the situation which has got both the governments and the Congress(I) in a state of extreme embarrassment. Both the warring states are run by the Congress(I) and Saikia even happens to be the chairman of the north-eastern region Congress(I) coordination committee. "It is really a fight within the family," confessed an Assam Congress(I) leader as a feeling of embarrassment is shared by partymen on both sides of the disputed fence. Yet no one says what will ensure that guns will not boom in the foothills again.

Gurbhej Singh: terrorist ambitions

SIKH YOUTH

Wounded Psyche

ACROSS the length and breadth of Punjab, whether village or town, the overriding atmosphere is of sullen anger, an intense feeling of having been wronged; of being up against the wall. Such feelings are alien to the Sikh psyche and in many cases, among the more hot-headed youth, the sense of frustration finds an outlet in terrorist action. So deep are the wounds and widespread the sense of alienation, that, tragically, the security agencies find it virtually impossible to differentiate between the hard core terrorists and those who only pay lip service to it. To gauge the mood of the Sikh youth in Punjab and better identify their feelings and the reasons for them, Special Correspondent RAMINDER SINGH recently toured the troubled state extensively and talked to a wide cross-section of the youth in the villages as well as the cities. His report.

TRAVELLING through Punjab is no easy task these days. Approaching the troubled districts of Amritsar and Gurdaspur the barricades increase as do the numerous security checks. Passengers are asked to get down from buses to be searched; tongas, scooters, motorcycles are routinely stopped. Rarely is a terrorist arrested or arms discovered at these highway checkposts. In over a month, a BSF manned checkpost between Jalandhar and Amritsar had recovered only one pistol from a car, but the searches continue. The harassed citizen deeply resents this frequent invasion of his privacy, and is generally unwilling to help the security forces when the need to apprehend a real terrorist arises. More than anything else the hamhanded police action serves only to needle an already alienated population causing it to believe that Punjab is under occupation.

Being armed and riding motorcycles appeals to the macho instincts of the youth, and Bhindranwale realised this. Wearing a kesari turban is a macho invitation to danger.

Car searches along the highways are the least hurtful of police actions. Most checks are perfunctory. "Kahan say aa rahay ho, kahan jaana hai" the jawans ask as if terroristic intent can be gauged from the replies. Larger sections of the population have been turned against the Central Government, which is perceived as the directing authority, by the midnight knock, the late night searches and arrests, often on the flimsiest of evidence or no evidence at all, of young Sikhs suspected to be terrorists. Even former foreign minister Swaran Singh, a perceptive observer of the Punjab scene, says that "70 per cent or more of the arrested youth in Punjab are absolutely innocent. Still they are made to go through the police grinder". And he is not a man given to hyperbole. "If this process, which has created the present mood among the boys is reversed, the accruals to the numbers of terrorists will stop." This observation is echoed by youth and elders alike across the troubled state; it is the police tashaddud (tyranny) which is creating extremists. "Nobody is going around recruiting terrorists," says Swaran Singh, adding that any violent incident is swiftly followed by the police rounding up suspects indiscriminately. The Delhi bombings last month triggered off a virtual competition among the police of neighbouring states and they succeeded in rounding up nearly 1,000 persons. But long after those actually responsible for the killings in Delhi and elsewhere were arrested, those picked up in Punjab remain in jail. As one young man arrested on the Pakistan border said: "Once an innocent person suffers at the hands of the police, the germ of terrorism is born in his mind even if it wasn't there before."

Car search on Jalandhar-Amritsar highway

Take the case of a young student of Jalandhar's Lyallpur Khalsa College which is narrated by Principal Harnarinder Singh. The student was released by the police just before the college examinations started in May. He pleaded with the principal that he may not be able to take the examination because of the injuries he had suffered in detention at the hands of the police. The boy took off his shirt to display a chest criss-crossed with deep, inflamed cuts. He said the police had used blades to lacerate his chest and then rubbed salt into the wounds. This young man was willing to listen to reason, but others are turned into ripe candidates for the ranks of the terrorists.

Some youth seek revenge after being persecuted or tortured by the police, others react after seeing their parents and elders humiliated in front of the entire village. "They pull the beards of our elders and knock off their turbans," complained a young 18-year-old student of Amritsar's Ajnoha village, who put on a kesari turban and travelled to the Golden Temple to amrit chhako (take a vow to observe the most fundamental aspects of the religion). "We want that no one should show any disrespect to our faith," he said, adding that such incidents had charged the atmosphere in the countryside with tension and almost all youth supported the demand for Khalistan. Had he thought about what Khalistan meant, its territorial boundaries, its viability? "That's for our leaders to think about," he shot back. Before Operation Bluestar his father, a retired army man, was a kattar congressi, but no more.

Most Sikhs see Operation Bluestar as the starting point of the process of alienation. All that went before is forgotten and subsequent happenings, particularly in the wake of Mrs Gandhi's assassination, created the apprehension that their future in the country was insecure. "The action against the Golden Temple has created a mental block. Time does not move after that," says Dr Attar Singh, professor of Punjabi Studies at Punjab University, Chandigarh.

There is young Gurbhej Singh Gill, at 16, a minor celebrity in Amritsar. A class 10 student, he is one of the youngest self-proclaimed terrorists in a city which has produced many, specially since last June. Gurbhej came to the notice of the authorities recently, when he was caught attempting to cross over to Pakistan near the Dera Baba Nanak border along with a 13-year-old schoolmate, Inderpal Singh. Gurbhej's case is important because he is not the standard village boy. Son of a retired havildar major he spent most of his childhood in the nationalistic environment of army cantonments and Central schools. In the Central School in Amritsar too, Gurbhej used to join his schoolmates in lustily singing Saray jahan say achchha Hindustan hamara. But his feelings changed after Operation Bluestar. From his house in Gumtala village on the outskirts of Amritsar, he could see and hear the blasts as the army attacked the terrorists holed up in the Golden Temple. "Army action ton baad dil bahut kharaab hoya tay asi sochiya kay government day khilaaf larna pavega." (I felt very bad after the army action and I thought that we would have to fight against the Government.)

The first step was to substitute Khalistan for Hindustan in Saray jahan say achchha. Then came the kesari coloured turban. Gurbhej said that after Operation Bluestar Hindu boys in the school used to taunt him saying mar gaya tumhara Bhindranwale. He resented this even though he was no follower of the slain man having seen him just once and that too from a distance at a religious congregation. If Sikh boys did anything mischievous in school the Hindu boys would say yeh darbar sahib nahin hai, and this invariably led to fisticuffs.

But what pushed him over the brink was the killing of innocent Sikhs in Delhi and elsewhere after Mrs Gandhi's assassination and the resolve was born to go across to Pakistan for military training. He had no fear of being arrested in Pakistan. "I never thought negatively that I would be shot or arrested. Ik vaari aadmi iraada pakka karlay tay koi vi mushkil nahin rok sakdi. Jo karna so kar dayna hai." (Once a person makes up his mind then nothing can stop him. What has to be done must be done.)

The authorities thank their luck for having foiled Gurbhej, whose dimpled, innocent face hides a razor sharp brain and a scary determination. They admit that the strongly motivated Gurbhej has the makings of a leader and it was just as well his clandestine Pakistan trip was aborted. Moreover they can now analyse what makes an innocent schoolboy cross the line into terrorism's dark and dangerous world.

"The Sikhs want to know what the preponderant majority wants of us. Does it want to keep the Sikhs with them? This is the vital point."

—SWARAN SINGH

Like Gurbhej there are many young students in schools and colleges in Punjab: young, angry and frighteningly single-minded, who voice similar sentiments. Like the two 16-year-old prep students from Sansarpur village on the outskirts of Jalandhar Cantonment. Why were they wearing kesari turbans? Pat came the reply "Because we want Khalistan". Behind that radical slogan, there lies a complex sense of injury, a desire for a place where, they say, their religion will be "safe", where they will experience "full respect for our places of worship and the right to live as first-class citizens. If they consider us equals and treat us as equals maybe we won't ask for Khalistan," one of the boys replies. For most of them Khalistan is just a knee-jerk demand, raised because they know it annoys the authorities. In their minds Khalistan is not yet a firm ideological concept, but the seeds have been sown by the attack on extremists in the Golden Temple and the wholesale burning of gurudwaras and killing of Sikhs in Delhi last November. This created a psychosis that Sikhs and Sikhism may not be allowed to survive in India. Asks Swaran Singh: "The Sikhs want to know what the preponderant majority wants of us. Does it want to keep the Sikhs with them? This is the vital point." Since this question is echoed all over Punjab, the most important task before the Government is to do something to demonstrate to the Sikhs that they and their religion are secure in India. Chandigarh and the river waters are only the political demands of the Akalis. The main issues for the Sikhs in and outside Punjab are self-respect and the security of their religion.

A professor of the Lyallpur Khalsa College in Jalandhar said whenever he told students that Khalistan would mean severe problems, the students replied "Are we happy here?" Being armed, and riding motorcycles appealed to the macho instincts of the youth, and Bhindranwale realised this. Wearing a kesari turban is a macho invitation to danger, because security forces have in the past taken away youth who wore kesari. When this happened students of the Amritsar Khalsa College wrote to the deputy commissioner asking why the authorities objected to kesari, a colour in the national flag.

The more elderly and mature among the Sikhs in Punjab also seem to understand and sympathise with the problems of the youth. When a call is given in the name of religion a large number of Sikhs psyche themselves into responding with an almost fanatical fervour, or dharmik junoon as post-graduate student Paramjit Kaur of Guru Nanak Dev University calls it. "So far the Sikh has proudly been laying down his life for the nation. Now he talks of laying down his life against the nation in defence of his religion. "The Government has thus

Many happy returns.

When Thai became airborne in 1960, our philosophy was simple. Only the best of people would run the airline. Only the best aircraft would make up the fleet.

And the standard of service would be of the gracious, traditional kind. Thai's Royal Orchid Service took off and hasn't stopped climbing since.

Our pioneering spirit has flourished, too, since we opened up Kathmandu and Bali in the late 1960's.

We were one of the first to establish a special business class.

We introduced the first non-stop flights to Europe. And established a north-west gateway to America.

Served by an ever-expanding fleet of magnificent 747Bs and wide-bodied A300s, Thai's route network now includes over 40 cities in 32 countries across four continents.

Many happy returns, many happy departures.

turned a tremendous asset into a liability," rues Chandigarh human rights lawyer K.T.S. Tulsi.

The Sikh collective consciousness derives from his religion, argues Dr Attar Singh. Mrs Gandhi's assassins Beant Singh and Satwant Singh were only peripheral Sikhs, yet they felt driven to avenge the events in the Golden Temple. Dr Singh explains: "Beant, a Harijan, was a CPI(M) student activist in his college days in Chandigarh and married a Christian nurse, Bimla, now being called Bimal Khalsa. Satwant, on the other hand, is the son of a Radha Soami father and was clean-shaven when he shot Mrs Gandhi. He grew a beard only in jail. If these people felt so bad about the army action in the Golden Temple, how would traditional Sikhs have felt?" The Sikh gurudwaras and shrines are a part of the daily life experience in Punjab. Historic gurudwaras, built to commemorate some event or deed in the life of the gurus, dot the countryside. The centrepiece of this religious consciousness is the Harmandir Sahib at Amritsar. "Amritsar Sikhaan da dil hai," explained a young farmer visiting the Golden Temple for the first time since June 1984.

At times like this young Sikhs recall the martial exploits of Guru Gobind Singh who for them remains the guru most worth emulating. Adorning the main hall in the gurudwara at Chamkaur Sahib, built on the spot where two of the guru's sons died in battle, are large paintings depicting the young warriors riding into battle. Young Sikhs come and sit rapt before these paintings, as did a newly married youth and his bride last fortnight. He turned out to be an employee in the deputy commissioner's office, but even this had not helped him escape humiliation and harassment at the hands of the CRPF. "Koi sunwayee nahin hai," he muttered (there is no redress). One hears this refrain all over the state and all the time.

Exactly the same words are repeated by a Malkiat Singh, a poor Mazhabi tea shop owner at the Ajitwal village mandi near Jagraon. He has reason to complain; after the Delhi bomb blasts the police took away his 14-year-old son Chamkaur Singh from the shop. The boy was released four days later after Malkiat stood bail for Rs 50,000. Argued Malkiat: "If we were involved in any nefarious activities we would not be cleaning dirty utensils at this tea-shop." The police never caught the real troublemakers but only rounded up poor people and Mazhabis to swell the arrest figures. Malkiat alleged that the police frequently took money to arrest the rivals of rich people who have scores to settle. The biggest extremists are the police he says. But despite this, the feeling of nationalism is not dead. Almost every wheat laden tractor trolley trundling into the Jagraon Mandi carries the painted legend—'Jai Jawan jai Kisan'. And farmer Buta Singh of far-away Jhander village near Tarn Taran complains that the Government is sowing the seeds of dissension by giving Punjab farmers a Rs 5 bonus on the wheat price but not to those in Haryana. "Are they not farmers too?" he asks.

"This is the crisis. The number of Khalistanis is microscopic, and most youth want only respect and jobs."

—GURBAX SINGH SHERGILL

What bothers Buta Singh is the question of a livelihood for his five sons who have to eke out a living from only four acres of land. This lack of jobs for rural youth, said Principal Gurbax Singh Shergill of the Amritsar Khalsa College, increases tensions in the countryside. Both yield and income from agriculture have peaked but the cost of agricultural inputs keeps rising. As a result "70 to 80 per cent of all landowners are in debt and cannot pay back their loans." Shergill said only 10 out of 100 graduates from the college could secure jobs. "This is the crisis. The number of Khalistanis is microscopic, and most Sikh youth want only respect and jobs."

To a large extent, Shergill's students agree. Many of them want a speedy solution of the Punjab tangle so that the Government can lift the ban on creation of new jobs. One such youth is agriculture student Gurbhajan Singh Aulakh, 22, from Nurpur Bedi in Ropar district. Concurs his classmate Tejpal Singh: "Extremism is born out of frustration and unemployment. If the Punjab problem is solved there would be no need for Khalistan." Arvinder Singh, 21, of Ropar's Mundian village is more forthright. If all innocent persons in jail were not released, the army deserters not treated leniently, and full protection not assured to Sikhs outside Punjab, then Khalistan would indeed become a reality. "First a person asks, then he takes," warned Arvinder Singh.

Paramjit Kaur does not believe in Khalistan, but she voices the feelings of her friends when she says "Assi agar Congress diyan juttiyan hi khaniyan nen tay Khalistan beyshak ban jaavey." (If humiliation at the hands of the Congress is the only alternative, then let Khalistan come).

The genuine Khalistanis probably number only a few thousand, and they will never be satisfied. For the rest Khalistan is only an emotion, a symptom rather than the disease. It is not yet an unstoppable juggernaut, but "you cannot counter Khalistan by making arrests and beating up people. It is an emotional problem born out of frustration and when that frustration is removed, Khalistan will be reversed," says Swaran Singh. The first step needed is to bring the Punjab problem back onto the political plane as something which can be solved by negotiations between the Akalis and the Central Government. Operation Bluestar and the later developments had turned it into a dispute between the Sikh community and the Congress(I) party. If this is done there is hope that the drift can be halted. But if no remedial action is taken this hope too can turn into frustration, just as the rancour in the Punjab countryside today is partly the product of too many of yesterday's hopes gone sour.

BANGLADESH

The Winds of Destruction

BANGLADESH, last fortnight, was slowly and painfully recovering from the devastating effects of the killer cyclone that raged through the numerous islands dotting the mouth of the Meghna estuary in the southern part of the country, resulting in one of the worst natural disasters in recent memory. Calcutta Correspondent INDRANIL BANERJIE and Chief Photographer BHAWAN SINGH flew down to Chittagong to cover the tragedy but encountered some unforeseen problems of their own. They were detained for over 12 hours by local authorities at Sandwip, barely 12 miles from Uri Char which bore the brunt of the devastation, on the day that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi arrived along with Sri Lankan President J.R. Jayewardene. No reasons were given. In Dhaka, the authorities also proved singularly uncooperative in giving out even standard official information about the tragedy or granting appointments. But civil officials and local inhabitants, in sharp contrast, were extremely cooperative in helping to piece together the build-up to the tragedy, its aftermath, and the abject failure of the martial law administration to either take effective pre-emptive steps to save many of the lives that were lost or to bring speedy relief to the victims in the wake of the cyclone. Banerjie's report:

RAMAZAAN, the month of ritual fasting for Muslims, began this year on May 22. In retrospect, it could not have been a more inauspicious day for it was on May 22 that meteorological monitors first spotted a cyclone of increasing intensity headed for the Bay of Bengal. But 48 hours later, the cyclone suddenly swerved towards Bangladesh and at 3 a.m. on May 24, it hit the southern coast with devastating fury at a speed exceeding 130 kmph creating tidal waves more than 12 feet high that washed away entire villages before the inhabitants had a chance to react.

Recalls Avlaitum, 35, an inhabitant of Uri Char: "We were inside our hut praying to Allah that the cyclone would pass us by when we saw a wall of water and the next moment we didn't know where we were." Only Avlaitum and his wife Jusnara survived. Five other members of the family were never seen again. A few lucky ones survived because the currents somehow washed them back to shore. But a week later, bloated bodies were still being washed ashore. Over 1,300 bodies were officially recovered from Noakhali district, as far as 20 miles away from where they originally lived.

The extent of the devastation became clear only when Bangladesh naval ships hesitatingly ventured out from their haven at Chittagong port more than 24 hours after the cyclone hit. Ten days after the disaster, the administration announced that 2,086 corpses had been recovered and another 4,855 people were missing, believed dead. The unofficial death toll, however, ranged between 10,000 to 50,000. At Uri Char alone, of the approximate 12,000 population, relief workers estimate that only 3,500 survived. The total damage was, in any event, of a frightening magnitude. Over 1,900 square miles of area spread over six of the country's 21 districts had been ravaged. Over a lakh houses were destroyed, 1,32,860 acres of crops destroyed along with an estimated 1.05 lakh head of livestock. The total number of people affected by the devastating cyclone was around 1.2 million.

But as in all natural disasters, survival can be as destructive as death. Hundreds of people jammed into the relief camps, many of them children, have lost entire families or their sole means of livelihood. Yet, an alarming majority of the former inhabitants of Uri Char are determined to return to the island and restart their precarious existence where death and devastation lurk round every corner. Says Mohamed Zakir Hussein: "We have nowhere else to go. Only in char lands can we till a patch of earth, keep goats and somehow survive." For many, living on the edge of survival, the constant battle with nature ensures that nightmares are a permanent feature.

But, as Abdur Rahim, executive editor of the Bangladesh Observer, the largest circulated English daily in Dhaka, says: "Ultimately, the people inhabiting the char islands can never win." The char islands are essentially temporary islands formed by silt deposited by the outflow from the estuaries. During the monsoons, most inhabitants move to the bigger islands like Sandwip and return when the waters recede. "These are places where only the most desperate people, the wretched of the earth, dare to live," says Rahim.

That, tragically, is the core of the problem. Till the disaster, Uri Char did not even exist officially. It was declared part of the Sandwip Upazilla only after the country's martial law ruler Lt-General H.M. Ershad flew to Sandwip with newsmen on May 26. Addressing a public meeting, Ershad declared that the char would have a proper administration and also promised that the long-awaited cross dam between Uri Char and Sandwip would be started next year. Chars are also the favourite targets of roving bands of pirates. Two days before the disaster, pirates raided Uri Char and took away the only radio on the island thus depriving the inhabitants of the special weather bulletins warning of the impending danger. The cyclone took away whatever little remained.

But even as the world reacted by pouring in relief supplies and financial aid, the Bangladesh administration came under increasing fire for the discriminatory manner in which the relief was being distributed. At Sandwip, which is relatively well connected to the mainland, relief operations were confined to the more accessible areas around the main town. A team of doctors who toured some of the worst affected coastal areas, found disease in the form of diarrhoea rampant and the people starved of saline and drinking water. "Several people have already died of diarrhoea and many more are on the verge of dying," said Ghulam Kibria, a forest official deputed for relief work. Elsewhere, there were innumerable stories of relief material being misappropriated by local officials.

The biggest problem, according to the newly-elected chairman of Sandwip Upazilla, Rafiquallah Chowdhury, was the navy's handling of the relief operations. "The navy gives relief to any gathering of people instead of going to the affected areas and giving it to individual families. People bringing relief are not being helped. This is not a good thing." In frustration, he blurts out: "I am the elected chairman and yet I have to sit back in my chair not being able to do a thing."

Currently, political and voluntary organisations bringing relief are being forced to depend on the painfully slow steamer services and local trawlers to reach the affected areas while the navy frigates and patrol boats sit snugly in their berths with hardly a shipload of material being dispatched each day. Admits Sub-Lt M. Rahman: "We cannot always send a ship each day." Even the air force helicopters based at Chittagong are being used almost exclusively for ferrying officials and only the occasional load of medicines and drinking water.

Though Commodore M.M. Islam, the martial law administrator of the Chittagong zone, reels of an impressive list of items distributed by the navy, even after the visit of Rajiv Gandhi and Sri Lanka's J.R. Jayewardene, only a few forlorn corrugated iron huts are visible at Uri Char.

CYCLONES

Death Wave

COASTAL Bangladesh has since antiquity been devastated by killer cyclones, recurring every decade and in their passing churning a wake of death and destitution. "It's a curious coincidence of topography and social conditions that make cyclone tragedies inevitable in this part of the world," says Dr H. Zahman of the meteorological station at Dhaka.

Strangely, it is not the cyclones brewed in the Bay of Bengal that are in themselves responsible for the destruction. "Cyclones formed in the bay, for instance, never exceed a speed of 150 miles per hour, whereas typhoons and hurricanes in the Pacific and Atlantic travel faster than 200 mph," explains Dr Zahman, "and yet cyclones hitting coastal Bangladesh prove to be far more destructive than either typhoons or hurricanes." What is more, cyclones hitting coastal Orissa or Andhra generally create less havoc than similar ones appearing over the Chittagong, Noakhali, Barishal and Patuakhali districts of Bangladesh.

The problem is the abrupt elevation in the underwater continental shelf in coastal Bangladesh and the funnel shaped mouth of the Meghna Estuary. "When the cyclone moves over the sea it pushes ahead a wall of water called a surge or sea level rise," says Zahman, "and this surge gets abruptly amplified to a wall of water 10 to 15 feet high."

Even this surge would not have been so destructive had the "tidal range" that is, the difference in the height of sea level between low and high tide, not been extremely high in the coastal region towards Chittagong. Thus, a similar surge hitting the mouth of the Hooghly or Orissa would not rise as much as it would during high tide in coastal Bangladesh. Not surprisingly, every major cyclone disaster in the area has been caused by a surge sweeping in during high tide in the dead of night.

The pre-monsoon cyclones occurring in the months of April and May are generally less powerful than the post-monsoon (October-December) ones, but catch the islanders in the chars (mud islands) unawares. This time too, the inhabitants of smaller chars like Lakshmi, Urir, Uttar, Kukri Mukri, who generally shift temporarily to safer grounds during the monsoons, were hit when they least expected it. A similar tragedy occurred 20 years ago on May 11 when about 20,000 people died.

Most really colossal cyclone tragedies have, however, occurred in the post-monsoon period, beginning from the historic disaster of 1876 which is said to have killed several lakh people. The next big killer occurred on November 12 1970 wiping out about 2 lakh people. In between there have been scores of less publicised disasters, killing 4,000 to 1,000 people each time. But for the people populating the chars, the cyclones are something to be lived with.

—ABDUR RAZAK,
general secretary, Bakshal

"Why should people continue to die like dogs while crores of takas being pumped into the country from abroad go into the constuction of Dhaka?

—WADUD BHUNIYA,

Charged opposition leader Sheikh Hasina, daughter of the country's founder Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, after touring the cyclone-affected areas: "The Government's relief operations are confined to what is shown on television as Ershad moves around with foreign leaders and teams of reporters." Hasina claims that according to reports from her workers, the lesser known chars have hardly received any relief at all. Her claims are echoed by Khaleda Zia, widow of assassinated President Zia-ur Rehman.

Such charges could have been dismissed as political polemic were they not so widespread. Among the common people, including large sections of the middle class, the aftermath of the cyclone disaster appears to have brought the festering resentment against the martial law regime boiling to the surface. Political parties claim that they are being prevented from distributing supplies and banners of the Awami League at relief camps have been torn down by martial law officials. At Uri Char, there is considerable anger directed not at Ershad personally but at his military with their arbitrary powers and their superior arrogance. The military dictatorship is being held responsible for callously allowing many of the 270-odd cyclone shelters built during Mujibur Rahman's rule to fall into disuse and the argument that the Government simply does not have the money to maintain and build cyclone shelters is dismissed scornfully even by civil servants.

Says Wadud Bhuniya, a resident of Hatiya island: "The Government has a massive programme for providing schools in every thana area in the country. It could easily build pucca schools that could be used as shelters." But that kind of investment and motivation will have to wait till the martial law administration first provides money to build the 1.37 lakh houses destroyed or damaged by the cyclone estimated to cost around Rs 6.5 crore. In all, the Government estimates it needs about US $ 50 million as foreign aid for the entire rehabilitation programme while contributions so far have totalled around $ 16 million.

But whether that money will be used for the actual purpose it is meant for is also open to question. "We are a poor country," says Abdur Razak, general secretary of Bangladesh Krishak Sramik Awami League (Bakshal), "but the Government never had any concern for the rural poor. Rural programmes, cooperatives and community centres have all languished during the military rule." The average Bangladeshi, like Wadud Bhuniya, asks the one poignant question that finds many an echo: "Why should people continue to die like dogs while crores of takas being pumped into the country from abroad go into the construction of Dhaka?" The answer, as the singer said, is still blowing in the winds.

SRI LANKA

Hope on the Horizon

IT TOOK a terrible tragedy to achieve what months of diplomatic effort had failed to do—bring about a summit meeting between Rajiv Gandhi and Sri Lankan President J.R. Jayewardene to thrash out a possible solution to the escalating ethnic strife in the latter country. Last fortnight, as the two leaders met in New Delhi and then flew down together to Bangladesh in a rare gesture of South Asian solidarity with a country ravaged by one of the worst natural disasters in recent years, it was clear that hope for an end to Sri Lanka's ethnic crisis hovered on the horizon. For the first time, a cease-fire, however temporary, in the bloody and brutal war in northern Sri Lanka was in the air if not yet on the ground. And, considering the build-up to the summit, that in itself symbolised a major miracle.

India's Foreign Secretary Romesh Bhandari had been dispatched to Colombo by Rajiv immediately after their return from Moscow. His mission: to persuade Jayewardene to come to New Delhi for a long-awaited summit. But Colombo was still smarting at the intemperate remarks made by Indian Minister of State for External Affairs Khurshid Alam Khan when he told Parliament that the situation in Sri Lanka's eastern provinces was "inhuman, cruel and barbaric".

> For the first time, a ceasefire, however temporary, in the bloody and brutal war in northern Sri Lanka was in the air if not yet on the ground.

The statement raised the curtain on a new round of tension in the Indo-Sri Lankan drama. Colombo stunned its neighbours by announcing that it would not attend the South Asian Regional Cooperation (SARC) meeting in Bhutan. But the set-back eventually produced a positive fall-out. Placated by appeals from Pakistan's President Zia-ul-Haq, Rajiv Gandhi and Bhutan's king Jigme Wangchuk, Colombo fielded a new personality on the south Asian scene. Instead of Foreign Minister S. Hameed or his deputy Tyrone Fernando who had called India the "biggest bully" on prime time television as well as in the Sri Lankan Parliament, the man chosen to represent Sri Lanka at Thimpu was Esmond Wickremasinghe. An ex-newspaper boss, the first Asian chairman of the International Press Institute, he was foreign policy adviser to former premier Sir John Kotelawela at Bandung and is a working

Air Craft

"YOU HAVE a pilot for prime minister. What else will you have if not airborne diplomacy?" asked a slightly incredulous Bangladesh army officer at Kurmitola Airport on the outskirts of Dhaka.

The build-up was indeed daunting and the action smacked of an airborne troop landing. Within moments of the landing of the Indian Air Force Boeing 737 carrying Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and Sri Lanka's President Junius Jayewardene, everyone, including the horde of VVIPs swiftly walked up the red carpet to the waiting fleet of helicopters and within 10 minutes of the landing the first helicopter, a blue-and-white Mi-8 was airborne. The remaining nine followed quickly.

The same spirit continued on the inundated Uri Char island, ravaged by a cyclonic tidal wave last fortnight. The bone-dry patch of landing cleared by the Bangladesh authorities in the morning had suddenly got flooded all over again due to high tide and there were just four dry patches left, leaving the helicopters to offload their passengers by relay. Three Bangladesh army jawans, each one carrying a freshly-washed pair of gum-boots, waited at the perch for the VIP helicopter carrying Rajiv Gandhi, Jayewardene and Bangladesh President Lieutenant-General H.M. Ershad. Rajiv Gandhi alighted first wearing his own green gum-boots. Jayewardene refused to get out of his sandals and was supported by an army jawan across the treacherous path leading a western newsman to wonder how symbolic it was of the state of affairs in Sri Lanka.

The path led to a tiny house on stilts, the only one to survive the tidal wave in the area and used by the relief authorities as their local headquarters. After a briefing by Major-General Nuruddin, in charge of the relief operations, the three leaders merged with the waiting crowd of cyclone victims and distributed clothes and rations.

This was, by all means, a most unusual diplomatic coup. At a time when river water talks were in progress in Dhaka, President Ershad, who has normally been full of complaints against India, had no choice but to say he was touched. "This gesture will strengthen the spirit of South Asian Regional Cooperation (SARC)," he declared at the evening press briefing. It was obvious that he and Rajiv Gandhi could not have had much time to talk in the course of a noisy helicopter ride. But it was possibly the first time in the post-Mujib era that an Indian prime minister and a Bangladesh president were spending a few cordial hours together.

The same in a way applied to Sri Lanka which has made no secret of its suspicions of India's intentions regarding the ethnic crisis in the northern parts of that country. All along the tour, Jayewardene was given pre-eminence in protocol and, according to diplomatic sources, talks on board the IAF Boeing were extremely cordial. The result was evident within two days of the visit: Jayewardene made a conciliatory statement to the Sri Lankan parliament and publicly stated that he trusted the Indian leadership.

More than a mercy mission, this was a diplomatic exercise and Indian officials were not too bashful about admitting that. After all, whether the Bangladesh Air Force could spare nearly half its operational fleet of helicopters for this occasion in the midst of a national calamity is a question that could have bothered them as long as Ershad was willing.

member of the ruling United National Party (UNP) as well as an intimate aide of President Jayewardene.

His reputation is that of an intelligent and quick-witted man with wide international experience and the epitome of old world charm. In other words, he was the perfect partner for India's new trouble-shooter for the neighbourhood, Romesh Bhandari. The change in negotiators on both sides produced immediate results.

In striking contrast to his predecessor, the ascetic, aloof and Brahmanical G.P. Parathasarathy, Bhandari arrived in Colombo bursting with bonhomie and succeeded in winning official approval in Colombo. He has earned the nickname Romesh "no problem" Bhandari and the hurriedly-convened Rajiv-Jayewardene summit was partly the result of his efforts. Wickremasinghe, on his part, had already smoothed the way during his 40-minute discussion with Rajiv Gandhi on his way back from Bhutan, a discussion widely hailed as a "breakthrough" by the media. When the killer cyclone swept through Bangladesh in late May, Rajiv's suggestion that the two leaders kill two birds with one stone by scheduling the summit along with a visit to Bangladesh found immediate favour.

Apart from the change in personalities it was the change in the situation in Colombo that lent weight to the pressure for a face-to-face encounter between the two leaders. The mid-May Anuradhapura massacre in which Sinhalese civilians were slaughtered, shook the Jayewardene Government and strengthened the groundswell of local opinion that the Government was incapable of controlling the situation. Admitted state minister Dr Anandatissa De Alwis: "Forty-five per cent of the people are opposed to the Government, right or wrong." The long-dormant Opposition suddenly found guts and voice and the Maha Sangha (the powerful higher Buddhist clergy) became a bold and unrelenting critic of the Government with 500 monks staging a demonstration near Parliament.

What put further pressure on the Government was the emerging alliance-in-action between the monks, who are held in high esteem, and the Opposition, particularly former premier Mrs Bandaranaike. The new spokesmen made it clear that in their view, the Government lacked either a military or a political solution. Colombo also is facing other unforeseen problems. Tea prices tumbled to their lowest level in two years while defence spending is eating away at the island's economy. The summit, according to top government leaders in Colombo, witnessed a "change of heart" in New Delhi. Evidently the Indian side expressed appreciation of the fact that with the best will in the world, the UNP is incapable of offering reasonable concessions to the Tamils in the face of increasing violence (the strategic port of Trincomalee with its racially mixed population was up in flames while the summit was on). The summit ended with the mutual agreement that only a reduction in the violence could create the climate for "progress towards a political settlement". In order to achieve that, India will clamp down on the Madras-based militants and stop any flow of arms and men to Sri Lanka across the Palk Straits. Colombo will reciprocate, once the de-escalation is seen to succeed, by stricter control over military operations.

RAGHU RAI

Rajiv Gandhi, Jayewardene and Ershad at Uri Char: effective diplomacy

On the other hand, the militant Tamil groups in Madras are dismayed at what they see as a victory for the Sri Lanka Government in the summit outcome, namely, New Delhi's agreement to pressurise the Tamil militants to lay down arms and check the arms flow into Sri Lanka. However, there is very little they can do if the Indian Government gets tough—India is their only hope for attaining their demands and it is India that has been providing them sanctuary.

But they insist that the ball is still in Sri Lanka's court. Says Professor A.S. Balasingham, spokesman for the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam: "For us to announce a cease-fire, we insist on the Sri Lanka Government fulfilling a few conditions. They should send the army from the northern and eastern provinces back to the barracks; they should remove the restrictions on free movement in certain areas; they should withdraw the concept of the Prohibited Zone and they should stop indiscriminate arrests." They also insist that any package concessions should be with the consensus of the Sri Lankan opposition parties and the Buddhist clergy.

But the attitude of the four militant groups constituting the Eelam National Liberation Front is somewhat different. In their view, the Sri Lanka Government is only seeking to buy time. Says a spokesman: "The Sinhalese people are themselves disillusioned with the Jayewardene Government for its failure to protect Sinhalese lives. That is why Jayewardene is so desperate to get a cease-fire agreement so that he can consolidate his position and strengthen the Sri Lankan army. The whole thing is a trap."

In that context, the strategy worked out at the summit still has some hurdles to overcome. The strategy is based on the supposition that while the violence is abating—there is agreement on a three-month-long cease-fire—the two sides will thrash out a scheme of devolution. But New Delhi will first have to deal with the diverse militant groups with their deep-rooted suspicion of Colombo's motives. It will also have to deal with the moderate Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF) and the Tamil Nadu Government. Colombo, on its part, has to control the war on the ground and see that the senseless killing of civilians and the creation of refugees comes to an end. More important, it has to produce concessions large enough to be acceptable to at least the TULF but not too generous to go against hardline Sinhalese opinion. The climb to the summit was smooth and swift. The descent to peace and political settlement will obviously be far more difficult.

ARMS PURCHASE

Delinking the Deals

AMIDST all the brouhaha that has enveloped Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's first and extensive diplomatic foray that has taken him from Moscow to Washington, the two ends of the ideological spectrum, one significant feature has been successfully obscured. Namely, the fact that despite much advance and enlightened speculation, no defence deals have been included among the many agreements signed during his globe-trot.

Before emplaning for Moscow in May, defence circles in India were abuzz with rumours that a major weapons package, including the MiG-29s, advanced missiles, submarines and howitzers was to be concluded in the Kremlin. Defence Minister Narasimha Rao had already visited Moscow prior to the prime minister's visit, ostensibly to put together the nuts and bolts of the package before the formal signing. In the event, the only agreements signed were of an economic nature.

Much the same scenario unfolded in Paris. In fact, speculation, even in the French media, had been even more intense than in the case of Moscow regarding the likelihood of India signing its biggest arms deal since the US$ 3.2 billion package it finalised in 1980 with the Soviet Union. The deal was widely reported to include additional Mirage 2000s (apart from the 40 flyaway aircraft already contracted for and due to start arriving next week) with the possibility of a transfer of technology agreement to produce the multi-role combat aircraft indigenously. It was also meant to embrace the purchase of helicopters to replace the aborted deal with the British-made Westlands, 105 mm Howitzers, another deal that has been hanging fire for years, missiles and electronic early warning systems. The package was also supposed to include civilian aircraft like the Airbus for Air-India and the Dauphin helicopter for the Oil and Natural Gas Commission. The speculation was further fuelled by the fact that Rao was along on the trip and that one of Rajiv's key engagements in France would be a visit to the Paris air show where the Mirage was the star attraction.

Ultimately, as in Moscow, no formal defence agreements were signed even though Rao met with his French counterparts to discuss terms and conditions and there is strong likelihood that at least in some areas, the discussions will prove fruitful in the near future. Even if the final agreements are announced shortly, the basic intention is to delink it from the visit. What all this represents is a new and long required approach to India's defence purchase strategy.No longer is a state visit seen as an opportunity to sell weaponry as was the case earlier. Witness Giscard d Estaing's visit to India when the original Mirage 2000 deal was signed scuttling the claims of the less profitable Anglo-French Jaguar or Mrs Gandhi's visit to Moscow in 1982 when India's stable of MiGs was updated considerably.

Rajiv at the Paris air show

Rajiv Gandhi obviously has a different style and approach to weapons purchases, by one, ensuring that it is tied to political objectives as in the case of the British Westland deal where the Indian Government, upset at the inability of the British Government to bring Sikh extremists to heel despite assurances, abandoned the agreement while in its final stages. Secondly, he is also making it clear that whatever efforts are made to improve bilateral exchanges, as in the case of France or the Soviet Union, weapons purchases will no longer be an expected bonus.

The fact that no defence purchases were finalised indicates that the new strategy is to take a more careful look at possible options before making the final choice—both the MiG-29 and the Mirage 2000 are being touted by their respective manufacturers as a counter to the F-16s in Pakistan's arsenal.

A significant pointer to the new strategy is the fact that though quite a few of India's urgent defence requirements are, and have been, hanging fire for some time, since Rajiv's ascension to prime ministership, no major defence purchases have been made in knee-jerk reaction to Pakistan's recent highly sophisticated arms acquisitions from the US.

According to defence sources, the new approach is evident in the decision making process as well. In previous years, recommendations were made by the bureaucrats in the Defence Ministry based on evaluation reports and requirement orders provided by the users, namely, the services. In many cases, bureaucrat preferences and perceptions overruled the user's recommendation, or, as in the case of the Sea Harrier deal, inter-service rivalry played a major role. The final decision-making process, consequently, was a mixture of various elements and pressures, all pulling in different directions. The classic example is the 105-mm field gun that has been under evaluation for the last eight years.

Further, the fact that Mrs Gandhi had little time for extended meetings with the concerned parties usually meant that it was the bureaucratic recommendation that eventually took precedence. Rajiv, on the other hand, partly because of his interest in and knowledge of aircraft and military equipment, is a different proposition. According to insiders, reports by evaluation teams are carefully scrutinised, queries raised and additional information asked for. He or his close aides hold regular meetings with purchase committes to finalise the exact requirement, and narrow down the options. But the final decision is left to Rajiv along with one or two of his closest aides. Apart from streamlining the procedures and making arms purchases more realistic to the country's needs, the new approach is intended to put an end to the pressure of political elements, both external and internal, eliminate the traditional evil of kickbacks and reduce the role of the bureaucracy. The French at least, considering the Bolley embarrassment, will no doubt parlez vous with enthusiam.

FESTIVAL OF INDIA

A Spectacular Success

PARIS has everything. But today we bring you India." If anybody in the select gathering was sceptical about Rajiv Gandhi's words, he only had to peer 187 feet down from the "Belle France" restaurant on the first floor of the Eiffel Tower to look at the sprawling, rapturous spectacle unfolding in the vast expanse between the tower and the Trocadero. The Indian tricolour fluttered everywhere, luminous Ahmedabadi kites snaked and darted across the grey skies, camels and elephants ambled in front of the pavilions of the Palais de Chaillot. 210 Indian performers began their acts at various points on either side of the Iena bridge, the air was pungent with the aromatic smells of lamb biryani and crisp masala dosas as though it were a street in Chandni Chowk or Mylapore. Mesmerised by the 'exotisme', colour and spectacle, over 200,000 Parisians congregated eagerly at the inaugural Mela signalling the beginning of the L'Annee de L'Inde in France.

As the extraordinary Mela began, Rajiv Gandhi and President Mitterrand moved around chatting with some of the country's most distinguished personalities. France's second TV channel, Atenne-2, covered the event live at prime time just after one of the country's foremost series, Chateauvallon was shown. That night India seemed omnipresent in France. TF-1 showed several hours of Indian 'variety entertainment' that began with Satyajit Ray's Sadgati followed by vocal music by M.S. Subbalakshmi. Never mind if it started close to midnight on a working day and not many could have found it hypnotic enough to stay up to watch.

For the Indian prime minister, it must have been a beguiling moment. As an 11-year-old, he had visited the Eiffel Tower with his brother Sanjay. The gilt-edged visitor's book at the Eiffel Tower marks the entry: "Visit by the little Nehru children." Thirty years later, Rajiv Gandhi was back at the Eiffel Tower as prime minister to inaugurate what was India's most ambitious cultural event abroad. He had earlier been welcomed along with President Mitterrand by the French cavalry guard at the northern pylon of the Eiffel Tower.

The inauguration began when Rajiv handed a jar containing holy water from the Ganga to Mitterrand and simultaneously, at the Quai Branly, 10 Indian girls poured Ganga water into the Seine while 10 more threw flowers into the river. It was a ceremony dosed with heavy symbolism. But it seemed to generate unexpected reactions. Rajiv was asked at his farewell news conference with Laurent Fabius, if he thought that since French technology was being sought to depollute the Ganga, did it mean that by pouring Ganga water into it the Seine was now polluted? The prime minister patiently pointed out that it was from the Himalayas where the Ganga was still at its purest that the water was collected for the ceremony.

But polluting the Seine further could have been a prodigious feat since it remains one of the dirtiest rivers in Europe. There were no audacious Parisian volunteers willing to take a "holy dip" in the Seine as was initially suggested by some Indian officials. As one watching Frenchman remarked to INDIA TODAY, "obviously it is not going to be easy to recreate a "Benaras-sur-Seine." Following the symbolic ceremony, Rajiv presented Mitterrand with a baby elephant, Kaveri, at the landing between the "Belle France" and the Gustave Eiffel room. As Kaveri serenely relished her diet of bananas in her wooden cage, in the adjoining ornate salons of the Belle France, champagne and caviar, samosas and chicken tikkas were being served.

complex of terraces and stairways embellished with multicoloured water-jets and fountains, the Mela was gathering momentum. The richly embroidered bamboo arches were aglow with lights as hundreds milled around the puppeteers from Calcutta, acrobats, jugglers, magicians and strolling singers. The largest crowds were seen in front of the stunning panthi dancers from Madhya Pradesh doing their whirling human pyramid, Kerala's spellbinding Kalaripayattu and the Panchavadyam percussionists, and Teejan Bai's regal rendition of the Mahabharata. As darkness fell and the dazzling fireworks began, the crowds participation became livelier. Many a youngster was seen trying out the intricate steps of Gujarat's Ras dancers.

Befitting the French tradition, the longest queues were in front of the foodstalls. Catered by an Indian hotel, on the first night every morsel of food, from biryani and bhelpuri, tikkas and dosas to kulfis and jalebis, vanished within hours, much to the irritation of the late arrivals. Compared with the joyful radiance of the Mela, the initiators of the festival seemed a bit isolated in the upper confines of the Eiffel Tower. Rajiv himself seemed pleased at its extraordinary success. So did Mitterrand, his popular Prime Minister Laurent Fabius and the controversial Minister for Culture, Jack Lang. Watching the spectacle in introspective silence was the doyenne of Indian culture, Pupul Jayakar. The less formal members of the large Indian delegation like H.Y. Sharada Prasad and Mani Shankar Iyer ventured to mix with the dense crowds.

Buoyed by the spectacular success of the Mela, both delegations seemed to be in an upbeat mood when they met to discuss the more serious affairs of state. The French made an exceptional effort to treat Rajiv as a "very special guest". Contrary to normal practice, Prime Minister Fabius was present in person to receive him at the airport—a job usually entrusted to a minister. Rajiv, Sonia, their children Priyanka and Rahul were lodged at the opulent Palais Marigny, a stone's throw away from the Elysee Presidential Palace, associated with such legendary characters as Madame de Pompadour, Louis XV, Baron Gustave de Rothschild and since the days of President Pompidou, used to house sovereigns and selected heads of state.

Rajiv Gandhi met Mitterrand four times and yet again, as a special gesture, Mitterrand attended a dinner at Indian Ambassador Air Chief Marshal I.H. Latif's residence hosted by the prime minister.

The pomp and glitter of the elaborate French protocol was reinforced by unprecedented security arrangements. A dozen outriders were followed by carloads of special agents. Crack sharp-shooters manned rooftops whilst elite anti-terrorist squads were on constant alert. The ubiquitous gendarmes were mobilised in their hundreds and the venue of every function Rajiv Gandhi was scheduled to attend was minutely searched. Even at spots where the prime minister was seen only for seconds while descending from his car, the secret service had the neighbourhood finely combed and watched windows through binoculars.

The French secret service worked in close coordination with its British and American counterparts for Rajiv's visit. An Indian leaving for Paris from London during this period had to run the gauntlet of separate checks and questions. And anyone who resembled an Indian and was seen in inter-state trains was singled out for "special attention". The massive security operation seemed worth the effort when the visit went off smoothly with not even a single black flag—threatened by Khalistan zealots based in London—in evidence.

The prime minister and Sonia Gandhi appeared to have charmed both the media and the public. Newspapers eulogised the "handsome and dignified couple" and their well-behaved children. One commentator described Rajiv as "discreet", "direct", "practical" and one who refrained from rhetoric and moralising. He described Rajiv Gandhi as the "computer boy who had the grace of a young rajah who had abandoned his turban and his jewels". Rajiv conducted his meetings and his public engagements with commendable self-assurance. One example was at his meeting with senior editors of the western press. Asked by a British journalist if appalling wages made Indian bureaucrats and administrators susceptible to bribes or indulging in espionage, Rajiv retorted that there was no evidence that better salaries enhanced a person's personal integrity. After all, Britain, which was known to pay its administrators well, had produced some of the greatest spies of modern history. Even the redoubtable foreign policy specialist, Marie-France Garaud, seemed visibly impressed by Rajiv.

His speeches, although well-drafted, attracted little attention except for his strong support for UNESCO. His statement that "strong nations" were trying to bend international organisations to their purposes, was interpreted by an Associated Press correspondent as an attack on the US and Britain. He also referred consistently to Pakistan's nuclear programme. Answering to a reporter of the left-wing political weekly, Le Nouvel Observateur as to whether relations between France and India would be affected if France helped Pakistan acquire a nuclear bomb, Rajiv responded that it certainly would since this bomb could only be used against India.

Besides favourite issues like the North-South dialogue, disarmament, and the possibility of restructuring global trade through a new international monetary conference, what was of immediate interest was the review of bilateral relations. The French media obsession centred around how many helicopters India was buying. How many Airbuses? How many more Mirage-2000s? What about the 155-mm gun deal? Rajiv Gandhi seemed equally determined not to sign any commercial agreements during his trip, emphasising broader political ties and mutual goodwill instead. The accords that were agreed upon included the use of French know-how to clean the Ganga, the creation of a centre for advanced research in New Delhi (INDIA TODAY, June 15) and the setting up of an Indian consulate in the French overseas territory of Reunion in the Mascarene Islands of the Indian ocean. On the pipeline are negotiations for the supply of Dauphin helicopters for the ONGC, Airbuses, the billion-dollar 155-mm gun deal.

The first delivery of the Mirage-2000 is scheduled for later this month. There is also speculation over the possibility of the design and development of a light combat aircraft in India with the help of French expertise. If this project comes through the Dasault group would be involved. The setting up of an Indian culture centre in Paris is also being envisaged while tie-ups in computer technology between France and India using Indian software are being considered.

Two major obstacles remain to be sorted out, failing which they will continue to hinder Indo-French commercial ties: the French terms of financing are still unattractive and almost unaffordable, although Fabius argued that in certain areas French resource allocations to India have not been 'fully utilised'. The other problematic area which Rajiv Gandhi focussed on was ways to increase as well as diversify the range of Indian exports to France, apart from the traditional items. Breaking open France's protectionist market is not going to be an easy task. But unless and until Indian exports are increased, the balance of trade will remain heavily weighted in favour of France.

Best & Crompton 1984: a soaring leap over the Rs 100 crore mark

43% increase in turnover in 1984; new products, new collaborations, new investments. Chairman M K Kumar reports :

1984 in retrospect

"The turnover during the year improved from Rs. 85.15 crores to Rs. 121.63 crores. and the main increase is due to the expansion of our overseas operations in Malaysia and Saudi Arabia."

"The reserves position has improved further during the year, bringing up the total reserves to Rs. 17.01 crores."

The Company, with its ability to integrate advanced knowhow is poised for growth in the high-tech areas of the future.

Recent developments

Recent collaborations for manufactured products include those with :

- Weir Pumps, UK for process and industrial pumps – split casing, multi-stage and non-clog types
- Rotork Controls, UK for valve actuators
- Kone, Finland for elevators and escalators
- CGEE Alsthom, France for manufacture of busducts of higher ratings
- Sheepbridge Equipment Ltd., UK for foundry products – of wear-resistant alloys, SG iron, etc.
- Yanmar, Japan for marketing and commissioning of high-capacity diesel engine driven generating sets
- SIEMEX, UK for fire fighting equipment
- Masoneilan, France for control valves
- Terralight Corporation of USA to produce high-efficiency solar collectors.

"The continuing progress of the Company bears ample testimony to the steadfast support from Financial Institutions and Bankers, the devotion, hard work and perseverance from its people of various disciplines."

DHIRUBHAI AMBANI

THE SUPER TYCOON

I AM the bubble that burst," says Dhirubhai Hirachand Ambani with a wicked gleam—recalling media forecasts a few years ago that his company, Reliance Textile Industries, was a "bubble that could burst". But the press has been wrong, his numerous critics have been wrong, and the doomsayers have finally fallen silent. For the facts now stare them in the face.

Today, Reliance is barely 18 years old, but it already has the largest net worth among all private companies in India. It made more profits last year than any private company in the country, and it ranks third in both sales and total assets among the country's corporate giants.

Reliance has just paid out more money as share dividends than any company in Indian history. It has more investors than anyone else: 1.2 million. And Ambani talks of taking that figure to five million in the next two or three years. That is equivalent to the head of every household in Bombay, Calcutta and Delhi becoming an investor in Reliance.

The company last month had the largest ever attendance at any annual shareholders' meeting: 12,000. No hall in the city of Bombay could hold that number, so the meeting had to be finally held in a football ground.

The list of 'firsts' continues. Reliance produces more cloth every day than any other textile company, and does it more profitably than any other company. It is the country's largest importer of synthetic yarn. The company already produces more polyester filament yarn than any other rival in the business (10,000 tonnes), and is more than doubling its capacity. Soon, it will also be the country's largest if not its only producer of polyester staple fibre, purified terephtalic acid and mono-ethylene glycol—both these being raw materials for polyester fibre—and of linear alkyl benzene, which is used to make synthetic detergents.

Reliance is investing more money every day than any other private corporate entity. The projects currently under way involve a total investment of Rs 675 crore, and all the projects will be completed in two years, which makes for an investment of almost Rs 1 crore every day. Already, Reliance holds what is probably a world record in setting up a 10,000, tonne polyester yarn plant in 14 months, and the plant reached full capacity production in four days. Ambani now plans to break that record: his 45,000-tonne polyester fibre project may be completed in 12 months.

It goes without saying, of course, that Reliance has proved to be the finest investment proposition ever seen by the

NAMAS BHOJANI

Ambani addressing shareholders in a football field: stock market deity

Indian investor. Anyone who invested Rs 1,000 in Reliance when the company first offered shares to the public less than eight years ago, in late 1977, has so far got Rs 3,937 in dividends alone, while the market value of his investment is more than Rs 50,000.

Dhirubhai Ambani himself started his first venture, the Reliance Commercial Corporation, 25 years ago with a total capital of Rs 15,000. In 1967, he then floated Reliance Textiles with Rs 15 lakh in the kitty. Today, the market value of Reliance shares totals—hold your breath—more than Rs 10,000 crore. And Ambani estimates his personal net worth at Rs 150 crore.

The village schoolteacher's son has certainly made good. His company will soon be the single largest contributor to tax revenues, with excise and other duties payable estimated for 1987 at Rs 600 crore, which is roughly 5 per cent of the Central Government's total excise collection. By then, Reliance will almost certainly be the country's largest private company in terms of both sales and assets (it currently ranks third, behind the two Tata giants Tata Steel and Tata Engineering—both many decades old). And it will in all probability be the first private Indian company to figure in Fortune magazine's list of the 500 largest corporations outside the United States.

Indeed, when everyone thinks that Ambani has finally arrived, he himself thinks that he has only begun. Everything that the company has achieved over the last 18 years will be achieved all over again in the next three years. The company's turnover is billed to go up from Rs 604 crore last year to Rs 1,400 crore in 1987, its net worth is expected to climb from Rs 246 crore to Rs 550 crore, and its fixed assets from Rs 520 crore to Rs 1,200 crore. As if that weren't enough, gross profit as a percentage of sales is expected to climb from 19.6 per cent to an unbelievable 29 per cent.

The most incredible part of this story is that even after investing Rs 675 crore in the next two years, the company will still not be fully stretched financially. Right now, Reliance does not owe a paisa to any of the Government-owned financial institutions, on whom virtually every other company depends for finance. And even when the current projects are completed, the ratio of its loans to share capital will leave room for more loans to finance fresh investment of between Rs 800 crore and Rs 1,000 crore. And though Ambani is not saying so, he is already working on new projects to venture into as soon as he is ready for them. The growth, it seems, will continue. And the bubble does not seem about to burst.

No one, least of all Dhirubhai himself, could have foreseen all this. At school in Junagadh in Gujarat, from where the young tycoon-to-be matriculated while staying in a local hostel, his ambitions were limited to possessing a car or a jeep. Later, he went to Aden as a clerk in A. Beesse and Company, a French firm that acted as agents for Shell Oil. Dhirubhai was soon put in charge of retail marketing, his work taking him to such out of the way places as Eritrea, Djibouti, Somaliland, Kenya and Uganda. "Mazaa aathi thi" (I used to have fun), he now says of his past with a laugh.

Soon enough, the entrepreneurial bug bit him, and he returned to Bombay to start his first venture, the Reliance Commercial Corporation, with a total capital of Rs 15,000 and a shared office in Bombay's Bhaat Bazaar. He exported ginger, cardamom, turmeric and other spices to the west Asian market where he had established links during his Aden stint, and then branched out into textiles and yarn in the early 1960s. His most unusual export, however, was the good earth: a sheikh in Saudi Arabia was keen on cultivating a rose garden and needed a good soil mixture, which Ambani supplied, ready as always to seize a commercial opportunity.

In the years that followed, Ambani specialised in hawking imported yarn. A Bombay businessman recalls the Ambani of those days as being a "pucca Gujarati bania", stalking the city's yarn market, living off tea-shop snacks and endlessly chewing paan. Dhirubhai's younger son, Anil, recalls that through much of the 1960s the family lived in a one-room chawl, with Anil and elder brother Mukesh growing up in the neighbourhood bylanes.

By 1967, Dhirubhai was ready to start Reliance Textile Industries as a private limited company with a share capital of Rs 15 lakh. He didn't have all the money he needed, so he asked the people he knew for help. This included Viren Shah of Mukand Iron and Steel Company, who came from Ambani's seaside village of Chorwad (now a tourist spot) and whose family was the biggest landowner in the village. Shah told a friend later that he was asked by Dhirubhai for Rs 4 lakh, but that he turned down the request on the ground that "this project will not fly". He couldn't have been more wrong.

Somehow, Ambani has always attracted scepticism. Even in 1977, when Reliance was changing to a public limited company and its shares were being offered to the general public, numerous investors didn't want a slice of the still untested cake. D.N. Shroff, then president of the Silk and Art Silk Mills Association and a long-time friend of the man he calls Dhiru, remembers trying to persuade friends in government to buy Reliance shares worth Rs 1 lakh, but with practically no luck.

If few people saw then that this was going to be a goldmine, and that Ambani had the fabled Midas touch, the critics kept pace with Ambani through his early successes. Throughout the 1970s, Ambani made most of his money importing and exporting rayon and nylon yarn and fabrics, on which the profit margins were stupendous because of their domestic scarcity. Grabbing scarce import licences, often hawking them at a premium, Ambani was quicker off the mark than everyone else in the biggest money-spinning operation of the decade. Critics have charged then and ever since that there was more to this initial success than is publicly known.

Shroff recalls criticism at the time from a host of rival industrialists, who charged that Ambani was indulging in black marketing. He informed Dhirubhai of the criticism, and the man's response was typical. He asked Shroff to summon a meeting of his executive committee, comprising the biggest industrialists in the synthetics business. Dhirubhai was then invited to face his critics, but he had them silent with one question: "You accuse me of black marketing, but which one of you has not slept with me?" Since all of them had at one stage or another bought yarn from or sold yarn to Ambani at the going rate, none of them had an answer. Dhirubhai had made his point: no one in the business could act holier than Ambani.

Other criticisms have been voiced over the years: that Ambani has used friends in high places to get his way and to put down rivals, that Ambani has mysteriously managed to always get the licences he wants, and to get the Government to announce duty rates that help him while putting own his rivals. Dhirubhai himself affects impatience with such carping, but there may well be a point to what the critics say.

In 1982, for instance, Reliance was getting ready to manufacture polyester yarn from imported dimethy terephthalate DMT, while the rival Orkay Silk Mills planned to use polyester chips as raw material. But in the budget of that year, the Government raised the import duty on polyester chips so that the Orkay project now faced a price handicap in the market. Then, in November 1982, almost immediately after the Reliance polyester yarn factory went into production, the import duty on the yarn was raised by the Government—giving Ambani a price protection that helped his profit margins.

Such cases can be multiplied. And Ambani's denials and explanations are not entirely convincing. He argues, for instance, that his friendship or acquaintance with people like former prime minister Indira Gandhi and her special assistant, R.K.Dhawan, were not helpful to him in his business: "One bureaucrat low down the ladder can say no to something which no one can then overrule."

Nevertheless, the fact remains that in 1980 he joined hands with some Congress(I) members of Parliament from Gujarat to host a party in a New Delhi hotel immediately after the Lok Sabha elections, a party that Mrs Gandhi attended as almost her first public engagement after being sworn in. Also, a liaison manager in an industry quite unconnected with Ambani's recalls sitting in the office of a joint secretary in the Industry Ministry when the joint secretary got a telephone call from Dhawan asking why Ambani's licence application had not been cleared. A short while later, Dhawan was on the line again, asking about progress, and the joint secretary was reduced to stammered explanations about the cyclostyling machine taking too much time.

It would be a mistake, however, to attribute more importance to all this than is warranted. As a friend of Ambani explains, "Any poor man who has made his money quickly and become wealthy has used a ladder that is not clean. But anyone who thinks that Ambani is successful only or largely because of this is living in a fool's paradise. The fact is that Ambani is a consummate businessman."

That point should be well taken. For

NARODA & PATALGANGA

Old and New

IN A DARK corner of a huge shed stands the machine which began it all: a warp knitting machine, one of four which Dhirubhai Ambani had installed less than two decades ago at Naroda, a few kilometres from the textile city of Ahmedabad. Today, Reliance's Naroda Textile Complex houses over a thousand machines in 110 acres of land, employs 8,400 workers, uses up electricity to the tune of Rs 3 lakh and turns out 2 lakh metres of fabric daily. Says Susheel Kothari, chief executive: "No one else could have done what we have in such a short time."

Kothari belongs to the old guard —he was with Dhirubhai in his first venture, the Reliance Commercial Corporation—and it is perhaps a measure of the company's overpowering work ethos that he has had no difficulty adjusting to the new guard: represented by none other than Anil Ambani, 26, the younger of Dhirubhai's two sons and the boss of what is the most modern mill in the country. "Our greatest advantage," says Anil, "is that we adjust very quickly to change. The other mills are decades old, so are the people who work there. It's much easier for us to institute newer procedures."

Anil explains that they are constantly modernising: last year, 280 state-of-the-art water-jet looms—where the yarn is flung across the threads by a jet of water—were installed. The textile industry in general still uses machines that are many decades old, but at Reliance, the average life of a machine is five to seven years. This makes sense, because as the licensed capacity is linked to the loom, putting in faster and faster loom means more production. Already, a loom today produces five times as much cloth as the ones 10 years ago did.

The pride of the plant is its unique computerised information system installed early this year at a cost of Rs 1 crore. Tapping keys on a terminal in his office, Anil can get information on each and every loom's functioning—production, stoppages, efficiency and so on. "We know what is happening at any given minute. The grasp that this gives us of every day working is tremendous." M.P. Gupta, manager, weaving, says, "Anil plans to link the system to the head office in Bombay, so that his father can have the same kind of access."

The lack of paper on managers' desks is another refreshing aspect of corporate life at Naroda. Says H.N. Arora, general manager, personnel and administration: "We try to take all decisions as quickly as possible, without going through the hassles of in-trays and out-trays. Anilbhai is very accessible." Anil himself recounts how he sometimes comes in early and drops little pieces of paper on everybody's desk, saying, "Why isn't this file cleared? Why is there so much paper lying about?" "It seems to work," he says impishly.

Anil Ambani with his water-jet looms: constant investment

Modern and immensely functional as it is, Naroda is already the past for Reliance. The future is closer to Bombay, on a sprawling 300-acre site, 71 km from the great metropolis where Dhirubhai's drive to become a petrochemicals potentate is taking shape at a frenetic pace. The Reliance complex at Patalganga takes up almost half of the entire industrial estate, dwarfing other plants like Orkay's Polyester and Bombay Dyeing's DMT factory. The core of the complex is of course, the 10,000 tonnes a year PFY (polyester filament yarn) plant, designed by Du Pont, set up in a record time of 14 months. The expansion to 25,000 tonnes is going ahead rapidly and all around can be seen the skeletons of structures which will house the other petrochemical operations. According to Mukesh Ambani, 28, Dhirubhai's elder son who is incharge of the crucial petrochemicals drive, the company started thinking about backward integration in the late '70s. "We were already in textiles so from there to production of the basic chemicals was a logical step backward." In about 10 years, therefore, Reliance will have conceived of, planned and implemented a series of projects which should see it producing, beside 25,000 tonnes of polyester yarn, 45,000 tonnes of polyester staple fibre (PSF), 75,000 tonnes of purified terephthalic acid (PTA), 40,000 tonnes of mono ethylene glycol (MEG) and 50,000 tonnes of linear alkyl benzene (LAB). "Diligence is the main reason for our speedy success," says Mukesh.

The man who has fuelled this enormous drive sits miles away in Bombay, leaving his sons and other colleagues to carry on the job. Dhirubhai Ambani visits Naroda twice a year, and Patalganga once in three months. His confidence in his people is not surprising, really, for it is only a function of his tremendous confidence in himself.

one thing, Ambani uses the same techniques and strategies that others do to influence government decisions and to run his business. The difference is that he is better at the game than they are. And as he himself says, "You have to sell your idea to the Government, and show how the company's plans fit in with national priorities. For instance, we import edible oils worth Rs 1,400 crore every year, so Reliance is looking at the possibility of going in for commercial plantations. The Government says it does not have money for projects, and I point out that Reliance can finance the project from its own resources."

The more important point, of course, is that Ambani has numerous strengths as a businessman, combining a talent for everything from marketing to finance and choice of technology. If he excelled in his early years in spotting a quick-money commercial opportunity, latching on first to a high-profit area of exports and imports, fixing on synthetic textiles as the growth-cum-profit area with maximum potential and later in knowing how to get his way with the Government, he has other strengths as well: spotting the right technology to adopt, working out innovative ways of marketing his yarn and financial wizardry with the hallmark of genius that has not been seen in Indian industry for some decades.

While other businessmen were thinking of going in for DMT plants that would feed polyester fibre units, Ambani spotted a worldwide shift in favour of a cheaper substitute, purified terephthalic acid (PTA), and went ahead with a PTA project.

While most yarn producing companies sold their product wholesale, Ambani and cousin Rasiklal Meswani, executive director in charge of yarn sales, set up a complicated retail selling system under which yarn is sold directly to small-

DHIRUBHAI AMBANI

"I will salaam anyone in the

A QUARTER century ago, Dhirubhai Hirachand Ambani put up his first commercial name-plate, that of the Reliance Commercial Corporation, in a corner of a borrowed office in an unpretentious part of Bombay. He couldn't afford his own office then.

Today, the 52-year-old tycoon has a 'Chairman's office' that takes up 8,000 square feet of plush carpeting in downtown Nariman Point. Ambani himself sits in a personal office embellished almost wholly in white, including white telephones. Four floors below is parked a white Cadillac, which Ambani used to use until he switched recently to a gold Mercedes 500. And on most days he prefers to dress in white safari suits that have almost become his sartorial trade mark.

The man himself is a bundle of energy, pacing in and out of his office, hitching up his trousers on an increasingly weighty torso, then sitting for a while to answer questions, and reaching out for a handshake after a wisecrack.

He obviously enjoys his increasing financial muscle, but has a problem with keeping his physical weight down. "I take a walk every morning, and go to the Oberoi health club in the evening. On week-ends, I try to go hiking in the Khandala hills." Although he still checks in at 76 kg, he has lost 14 kg in recent weeks. But even when he exercises or goes through his health club work-outs, his razor-sharp mind is never off business. Share brokers and yarn traders crowd round him constantly at the Oberoi health club.

He is not religious and does no regular pujas, but believes in God. He clearly has less faith in journalists, for he is constantly on his guard during interviews, watching which way the questions are headed, promising confidential information off the record and then delivering some innocuous titbit.

Last fortnight in Bombay, he spoke at length to Senior Editor T.N. NINAN and Senior Correspondent JAGANNATH DUBASHI. Excerpts:

Q. We'd like to start at the beginning. How did you start in life?

A. I had a very humble beginning. My father was a village schoolteacher. I started at the age of 17 as a clerk in a French firm in Aden. Please mention this, because I am proud of it and people should get inspiration from this.

Q. What were you paid?

A. Rs 300 a month. But I rose quickly, and when I left after eight years, I was in charge of retail marketing, getting Rs 1,100 a month.

Q. Why did you go to Aden?

A. I got the opportunity. I would have gone to South Africa if I had got a job there. Roti ka sawal tha (It was a question of bread).

Q. Did you finish school?

A. I did my matriculation, with only pass marks (laughs).

Q. What was your ambition when you were young?

A. I wanted to buy a car, an old jeep perhaps. I was a member of the Civil Guards, something like today's NCC. We had to salute our officers who went around in jeeps. So I thought: one day I will also ride in a jeep and somebody else will salute me.

Q. Did you think then of starting any industry?

A. Not at all. At 17 you can't expect much, and that too in a small village.

Q. What is the main reason for the success of Reliance Textiles?

A. I have seen over the past 15 years that people with savings do not have the correct avenues for investment. This is particularly true of the salaried and the middle class. They have to invest in bank deposits or units, which do not give very good returns. So more and more middle class people are attracted to my shares, and this is the success of Reliance.

Q. Would you call this Reliance's biggest contribution to industry?

A. What was the situation 15 years ago? Suppose I wanted to start a company: 60 per cent shares I would buy, 20 per cent would go to relatives, and the scale weavers who then sell their grey fabric back to Reliance, which processes and finishes this before unloading it on to the market as Reliance cloth with its Vimal brand name. In the process, Ambani has been able to get around the licence capacity limitations of his own weaving section and turn out far more cloth than he would otherwise have been able to. Says a contented Meswani: "As many as 25,000 units convert yarn into fabric for Reliance, and 30 to 40 per cent of our fabric comes this way. In the process, we have also earned the support of large numbers of customers for our yarn, because we guarantee them a market for their cloth."

If that speaks of Ambani's capacity for innovation, there are numerous other examples, especially in the field of finance, that underline the same point. Back in 1979, it was Ambani who first pushed through a forgotten idea in corporate finance, the convertible debenture. He had the devil of a time convincing the Government of its attractiveness as an investment proposition, arguing that it offered investors a guaranteed return as interest while simultaneously offering the prospect of capital appreciation when a part of the debenture was converted into shares.

The idea clicked, Reliance has issued six series of debentures in as many years for raising a record Rs 268 crore from the market, and other companies have jumped onto the bandwagon. As a result, the share market in the country has got its biggest boost in recent years because of the advent of the debenture. In the process, of course, Ambani has become the ordinary investor's stock-market deity.

More daredevil ideas were to follow, some of them breathtaking in their originality. Ever since 1977-78, for instance, Reliance had not paid a rupee as tax on rest the brokers would get. Now Reliance has created a revolution in the corporate sector. I have 12 lakh investors in Reliance, and this will become five million. Middle class people are joining hands to build something big. In the process, the country benefits.

In 1980, the total resources mobilised in the capital market was Rs 100 crore. Last year, it was Rs 2,500 crore. That shows we had the water but no pumping station. Everybody is now installing pumping stations. Just look at the number of people who have issued debentures.

Q. Do you think your financial strategy could be applied on a broader scale in India?

A. Yes, of course. For our seventh plan we don't have money for power projects, bridges, railways. There is no money with the Government, that is true, but there is money with the public. We can pump that money to a hundred Reliances and build a strong country.

Q. One reason for your success is your ability to manage the external environment. How do you do this?

A. The most important external environment is the Government of India. You have to sell your ideas to the Government. Selling the idea is the most important thing, and for that I'd meet anybody in the Government, I am willing to salaam anyone. One thing you won't find in me and that is an ego.

Q. But if three companies are trying to get the same licence, why does the Government favour you?

A. I tell them that I am putting in my own company's resources, and that the others will have to borrow from the financial institutions. My main edge is that we mobilise our own resources.

Q. Pranab Mukherjee is supposed to have helped get your last four licences.

A. People who wanted to criticise Pranab Mukherjee used me as gunpowder. Pranab was in the Finance Ministry, which does not issue licences. Also, how many people have got licences in India, and how many of them have implemented these licences? The country should salute people who implement projects quickly.

Q. You say the Finance Ministry does not issue licences, but it does decide duty levels, and these have often been structured to help you.

A. I don't think this is true.

Q. The new Government is said to be less friendly towards you, and the report is that they did not allow you to issue a convertible debenture issue, so that you had to go in for a non-convertible debenture issue.

A. We asked for a non-convertible issue and we got it. We don't require more equity, so we don't need to convert the new debentures into equity.

Q. What do you think of Rajiv Gandhi, and of the policies that he is trying to implement?

A. He is a first-class person, very honest, very sincere. And his policies will work. He is not just helping industry, he is helping the country to move faster.

Q. What new projects do you have in mind for Reliance? There is talk of oil exploration, computers, plantations and so on.

A. We will seize every opportunity we get. We continuously monitor every area, but that does not mean we will go into all of them. After all, if I see 100 girls, it doesn't mean I will marry all of them. But I must see all of them before I make my choice, mustn't I?

Q. How do you see your basic role in the company, now that it has grown to such a size?

A. Supervising everything and everybody, seeing that everything runs to schedule, solving problems.

Q. Have you set yourself a goal, like making Reliance the largest company in the country?

A. I would not like to say what I want to do before I do it.

Ambani in his palatial office: centre of a growing empire the substantial profits it earned, essentially because of outstanding tax planning by Ambani. But in 1983, the Government announced in the budget that companies would have to compulsorily pay tax on at least 30 per cent of their profits. Almost everyone thought then that this would slow down Reliance's frenetic expansion as some of the company's profits would be mopped up by the Government. But Ambani would have none of it. He announced shortly afterwards that the company was capitalising Rs 93 crore interest charges on its project loans, an unheard of stratagem that converted on-going expenditure into assets on which Reliance could now claim a higher depreciation write-off from its profits. Result: Reliance has stayed a zero tax company.

The purists have demurred, of course. Reliance's own auditors have noted in the company's annual report that the capitalisation of interest is not a practice recommended by the Institute of Chartered Accountants. But Ambani is undeterred, and he has got what he wants.

Still more breathtaking financial legerdemain was to follow. Last year, Ambani was getting ready to launch on his latest clutch of projects. But the company was financially stretched, with little elbow room to increase its borrowings. The solution: the non-convertible part of the company's debentures were also converted into shares.

This seemingly simple gimmick killed several birds with one stone. First, it reduced the company's debt while increasing its equity capital, so that the debt-equity ratio now provided room for more borrowings. Second, the debentures with a face value of Rs 100 were exchanged for 1.2 equity shares of Rs 10 each. This would seem unattractive for the investor, except for the fact that the Rs 10 share was then selling at Rs 115, while the market value of the Rs 100 debenture was only Rs 84. So the investor handed in an asset worth Rs 84 and got back another asset worth Rs 138 on the market.

The element of genius showed through this because while the investor gained, Reliance did too. The company had liquidated debt worth Rs 100 in the books and given out assets worth Rs 12 in the books. The balance went into the reserves fund, which swelled overnight by a whopping Rs 63.2 crore, while the 13.5 per cent interest burden on the debenture was replaced by a smaller dividend burden. Dhirubhai demurs modestly when asked who thought of this absolutely brilliant stratagem, attributing it to teamwork, but son Anil says the real brain was none other than Dhirubhai himself.

So the list of Ambani's strengths grows longer: commercial skill, technical understanding, financial wizardry, managing the Government, marketing innovation. But even this is not a complete list, for there is still more to the man who is now reckoned by everyone as the brightest star on the corporate firmament. Two additional strengths are revolutionary project management techniques that compress construction and erection time and the constant drive to modernise plant and machinery so that his own company escapes the fate of much of the textile industry.

Ambani takes an obvious pride in the speed with which he implements his industrial licences. His worsted spinning plant at Naroda, near Ahmedabad, was installed in eight months of getting the licence. In 1981, when he got the Government's permission to instal the latest draw texturing machines, he had the equipment flown in and installed in next to no time. This may partly have been because of criticism from his rivals that he had been allowed to get the machines when others had not, and he may have wanted to instal the equipment before the Government changed its mind. Nevertheless, the lightning reflexes of the man clearly stood out from the episode.

In 1982, he outdid E.I.Du Pont de Nemours, his collaborators for the polyester filament yarn project at Patalganga in Maharashtra, by getting the plant ready in 14 months, something that Du Pont itself had never managed to do in other countries. The real hero behind this achievement is Dhirubhai's elder son, Mukesh, an unassuming youngster of 28 years who wears his Stanford MBA lightly but who clearly has his father's genius in his veins. Mukesh attributes the record pace of project implementation very matter-of-factly to "diligence", and to the fact that he had no prior experience, "so I did not see the problems, only the solutions". But it takes S.P. Chakravorty, chief executive at Patalganga, to point out that whereas other companies would wait for equipment on order to land before linking its various pieces through the long arrays of pipes that are integral to a petrochemical complex, Reliance has done the opposite: at Patalganga, scores of kilometres of pipes were laid in readiness for the equipment, which was installed as soon as it landed. The magnitude of this achievement can be judged from the fact that one of Reliance's new projects has 220 km of pipes.

Modernisation is another key to Reliance's success. The Naroda plant was first started in the early 1970s with four warp knitting machines, but these are already museum pieces. As Dhirubhai's younger son Anil, who completed his own MBA from the Wharton School in 14 months before taking charge of the Naroda complex, points out, the average life of the machines at Naroda is only five to seven years. Last year, the company spent Rs 50 crore for importing 280 state-of-the-art waterjet looms and 16 projectile jacquard weaving machines. Investment of an even higher order is now planned for further modernisation and expansion.

When all is said and done, however, Ambani's greatest strength is probably his ability to keep changing to the situation in which he finds himself. He started out as an operator in international trade; when he shifted to manufacturing, the vast bulk of his sales continued to go out as exports—because that is where the profits lay, given the premium-fetching import replenishment licences that he got on his exports. He then shifted from knitting to weaving, switching focus to the domestic market. And just when everyone thought that Ambani's profile was getting fixed, he did the chameleon act yet again by starting a petrochemical operation that has now resulted in the logical culmination: Reliance Textile Industries is changing its name to Reliance Industries.

The bulk of the company's investment will soon be in polyester filament yarn and staple fibre, and then in PTA, mono-ethylene glycol (MEG) and linear alkyl benzene (LAB). And future investment could well be in a Rs 500, crore aromatics plant in Uttar Pradesh that will use four lakh tonnes of naphtha turned out every year by the Mathura oil refinery. Aromatics is the upstream raw material for synthetic fabrics, and will mark for Ambani the culmination of his drive for backward integration. So from being the country's most high-profile textile magnate, Ambani is about to transform himself into a petrochemicals giant. But he might change yet again, moving into oilseed plantations and oil exploration. As he himself says, "I will go in whatever direction that suits me."

Through these transformations, he has managed change in other ways as well. When he started out, his business forced him to footslog it through Bombay's teeming yarn market, and to wait outside the doors of the very textile tycoons who now envy him his success, because at that time they were his valued clients. Today, he can sit through half-day long sessions with journalists without a telephone call to disturb him: he has passed responsibilities down the line, and people take decisions at their levels.

He puts in no more than an eight-hour day, clocking in at 10.15 every morning when a 50-to 60-page report is always waiting for him, giving every detail that matters on the previous day's operations: production, marketing, finance. His role now is confined to supervising the functioning of his senior executives, making sure things are running to schedule and that problems are solved. And there is a mildly puzzled incomprehension when asked how he managed the shift from a one-man yarn hawker to the rarefied atmosphere of an 8,000 square feet 'Chairman's office'. "Decentralisation is the answer," he says simply.

If that is indeed the case, the two people he relies on most of all are his sons. For while he scoffs at their American degrees, touting instead the home-grown virtues of native entrepreneurship, he clearly relies on Mukesh to see the company through its Rs 675 crore expansion spree and on Anil, the more outgoing and articulate son, for running the textile complex and looking after the company's total marketing.

Meswani is another key figure: paunchy, and wise in the ways of the yarn market, Meswani has been with cousin Dhirubhai for the last quarter century. "He has taught me everything," Meswani says, and Dhirubhai clearly trusts his cousin to look after the company's complex yarn marketing operations.

"He used to buy yarn from us, now we buy from him."

VIRENCHEE SAGAR
managing director, Nirlon Synthetic Fibres and Chemicals

Chakravorty is another key executive, pulled out of J.K. Synthetics by Dhirubhai and asked to help Mukesh with the Patalganga operation. There are others like these, but Ambani now says he does not even bother with the recruitment of most of his personnel. He gives candidates the once over only if they are going to join in the key slots at the top. Everything else is decided lower down. And asked as to what kind of people he looks for, Ambani answers simply: "Engineers with talent."

All this decentralisation notwithstanding, Ambani's interests range far and wide. He is probably the best informed man in the country on the ups and downs of the smuggling business, because synthetic textiles are one of the most prominent items on the smugglers' list and these smuggled supplies his main competition.

Ambani's men estimate that a staggering Rs 3,000 crore worth of textiles are smuggled into India every year, a figure compiled by referring to the supplies reaching the United Arab Emirates from such sources as Japan, Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong and Singapore.

Ambani also keeps a close check on the activities of his rivals. Last year, the excise authorities mounted a major raid on Orkay Silk Mills. The result reported in the newspapers last month was a Rs 10-crore fine on the company and a Rs 50-lakh personal fine on its chairman, Kapal Mehra.

It is widely believed in Bombay's business circles that Ambani had a hand in the initial tip-off to the authorities, who then mounted the raid. Whether this is true or not the fact remains that there is no one to beat Dhirubhai when it comes to close-range fighting. Four years ago, when Ambani was trying to get a licence from the Government to manufacture polyester filament yarn, all the existing producers under the banner of the Association of Synthetic Fibre Industry ganged up to prevent Ambani from getting the Government's go-ahead.

But they reckoned without the trick up Ambani's sleeve. Knowing that the best way to break a cartel is to get one or two of its members on your side with the promise of goodies. Ambani seems to have driven a wedge through the ranks of the opposition, which quickly fell apart for his own licence to come through. It may be purely coincidental

He's having another heart attack while he is still paying bills for his last heart attack!

Day by day, it's becoming more and more expensive to fall ill. Only the very rich can afford it. And even they are beginning to feel the pinch.

A case study

Take Mr Kumar as an example. He has an understanding wife, a good job as a senior executive, two teenage children in college. And had only just finished paying for his beautiful home. And disaster struck ... a heart attack.

It cost him Rs 5885 in just 21 days! i.e. Rs 2985 on ICCU and Nursing Home Charges, Rs 1000 on doctor's consultation fees, Rs 1000 on daily ECGs and other laboratory tests and Rs 900 on essential drugs and medicines.

He was lucky to escape with just a garden variety of cardiac arrest. But now the financial pressures are back on him again, to pay back loans he had to take in order to meet his medical bills. Will he be lucky a second time?

UI can help you get back 80% of your money

Today, under UI's Hospitalisation and Domiciliary Hospitalisation Benefit Policy people like Mr Kumar can convalesce comfortably, without worrying about the bills.

Because, UI can help you recover 80% of your medical expenses a little after you've got back 100% of your health.

You can choose from a range of covers, depending on the premium you pay. The costs you can recover per year range from Rs 4000 to Rs 21000. It offers wide spectrum covers that allow you to get back a variety of expenses such as consultation fees, hospitalisation, surgery, medicines, laboratory tests, nurse employment, to name a few.

The lowest premium is Rs 48 per year. And the most expensive is only Rs 252 for the best facilities. And, for an extra 50% you can increase your benefits to cover major illness costs. From Rs 3000 to Rs 21000. Major illnesses include coronary surgery, open-heart surgery, kidney transplantation and others, where treatment lasts more than 30 days.

Low cost health insurance for the lowest income group

The UI Hospitalisation and Domiciliary Hospitalisation Benefit Policy has been specially designed for people in the lowest income groups. So that they too can afford today's medical bills. And get back to work faster. This gives the nation's work force a healthier alternative.

that around the same time J.K. Synthetics got the Government's clearance for expanding its own plant, but there are few in the industry who do not believe that the two events are connected.

But such successes in the teeth of opposition inevitably generate more opposition, and some of this surfaced on the Bombay stock exchange in 1982. Ambani was just then readying for the single biggest capital issue in Indian corporate history (convertible debentures worth Rs 50 crore), and it was important that Reliance shares maintained a good price on the market so that investor confidence in the company was boosted.

But barely six weeks before the debenture issue was due to open in May, mysterious forces began hammering down the price of the Reliance share, which dropped from Rs 131 to Rs 121 in 25 minutes of unprecedented trading and near panic. But Ambani reacted with lightning speed and his men were quickly on the floor of the stock exchange, picking up every share that was offered. By the end of the day, the price had recovered to Rs 125, and a quickly formed "Friends of Reliance Association" took the battle into the opponents' corner. They kept buying for the next few weeks, driving the share price up.

In most share market transactions, sellers do not have shares ready for delivery because they intend to buy back later at a lower price. This game was now thwarted because Ambani's men had driven the price so high. So the very sellers who were trying to beat down the price earlier now started buying because Ambani's men insisted on delivery, and this took the share price still higher, to a record level of Rs 175 and more. The sellers eventually lost an estimated Rs 3.5 crore for their pains.

Ambani's men had turned the knife with a vengeance after getting in deep, and the forces who had mounted the attack in the first place—presumably Dhirubhai's rivals in business—learnt a lesson that they will never forget: do not meddle with Reliance shares. In fact, Ambani is suspected to have tried to pay Orkay in the same coin last year, when it was Orkay's turn to float a share issue.

If Ambani emerged triumphant from some of these financial skirmishes, he got his fingers slightly burnt in 1983 when some non-resident Indian companies with such unlikely names as Fiasco Investments and Crocodile Investments bought Reliance shares. It turned out on investigation that some of the people whose names were listed as the directors of these companies had not even heard of Reliance, casting some doubt on who the real investors were. Ambani himself explains this away by saying that "non-resident Indian investors will never reveal their true identity", but most observers believe that this particular episode has not yet been fully explained.

But such controversies appear to be nothing more than occasional hiccups even as Reliance continues to digest one project after another and to gain weight rapidly. So even Ambani's contemporaries in business are now forced to pay tribute. Says Kapal Mehra of Orkay: "His track record shows that he is a go-getter. There has been a lot of controversy about the method he has adopted, but he has been successful, and I wish there were more people like Dhirubhai in India." And Virenchee Sagar, managing director of Nirlon, says: "He has this enormous, extraordinary ambition which should see him go far."

Such accolades, some of them grudgingly delivered, come on top of the adulation that is already Ambani's because of the unprecedented returns that he has given his investors. And the question inevitably crops up: what next?

There are clear signs that some leading lights of the Rajiv Gandhi government are not fond of Ambani, and one minister has a dossier ready on his past activities. But it is doubtful if even this can now come in Dhirubhai's way: Reliance is too big, and its creator still has a lot of creativity left in him.

Persistent rumour suggests that Ambani might get into the media game. His Mudra advertising agency, launched initially for in-house work, has already become one of the largest agencies in the business, with billings last year of Rs 8 crore. Mudra's offshoot is now investing Rs 4 crore in new video equipment that will launch Ambani into the growing field of TV and video film production. Bombay has also been buzzing with talk of an offer he made to R.K. Karanjia, editor of the local tabloid The Daily, and journalists have been approached with job offers by people claiming to be speaking on behalf of Ambani.

But Ambani denies emphatically that he wants to get into the media business. If one takes him at his word, he still has numerous fields beckoning him. Quite apart from the various projects that he has already on hand, he has a stake in a new private oil exploration company floated with other investors by H.T. Parekh. And as he points out, he has the ability to "pump money out of the people." In a capital starved economy, anyone who can get the capital together will clearly have no shortage of work to get done whether it is in edible oilseed plantations, oil related projects or computers, which too Dhirubhai is looking at.

One thing is certain. As he takes his morning constitutional on the Worli seaface, or has his standard breakfast of a papaya, Ambani is still thinking of the future, not the past. At 52, he has a good decade of work still ahead of him; and if his dreams come true, at the end of that period Reliance Industries could well be four or five times the size it is today. No one, of course, will be surprised.

Attention small and medium industries!

Now! The advantages of a machining center for just 20% of the cost! From BFW.

The BMC 2000/3000 series CNC Boring and Milling Center is backed by technical know-how from world-famous Fritz Werner of West Germany. All critical parts of these sophisticated machines such as Recirculating Ball Screws, DC Servo Drives, CNC Systems (Anilam Crusader II) and bearings are imported and assembled in India to exacting international quality standards.

The machine meets all requirements of accuracy, repeatability and speed. Thus BFW's CNC Boring & Milling Center pays back for itself in a short period. The investment starts to be productive straight away.

Noteworthy features:

- Provision of Motorised Overarm with vertical cutter spindle ensures possibility of machining on 5 different faces of work pieces.
- Jigs and fixtures totally eliminated. Hence lead time to produce a new component is negligible.
- System Anilam Crusader II is so simple that an operator can directly programme it. No need for a separate programmer.
- While rejection of components is a thing of the past, high accuracy is assured.

TECHNICAL SPECIFICATIONS:

Spindle Axis:

Longitudinal traverse from 770 mm up to 1170 mm
Cross traverse from 230 mm up to 320 mm
Cross adjustment up to 165 mm
Vertical traverse from 370 mm up to 420 mm

Main Spindle Drive:

Drive power AC Motor—horizontal and vertical 5.5 kW to 11 kW.

Sales and Service:

- BFW has a network of nationwide sales and service centres.

CAPITAL GAINS

DELHI is fast becoming the new mecca for advertising agencies. Three Bombay-based agencies—Sista's, Enterprise and Hindustan Thompson Associates' offshoot Contract—are opening branches in the capital, while three other agencies have been, or soon will be, set up in the city. Tara Sinha, former head of Clarion, is floating her own agency, to be called Tara Sinha Associates, Rediffusion's former Delhi branch manager is putting up an agency called Milestones, and Ulka has set up an associate company called Interface Communications. The rush to Delhi reflects the rapid growth of new business in the city, at 40 per cent a year.

Meanwhile, in Madras, R.K. Swamy Advertising has tied up with the New York-based BBDO International Inc claimed to be the world's fifth largest advertising agency in terms of turnover and the largest in profits. Swamy believes that the new tie-up gives his agency a particular advantage in Japan, South-east Asia and West Asia.

SECOND THOUGHTS

THE MODIS have developed second thoughts about tying up with the US communications giant AT&T, intended at one stage to launch a computer manufacturing project. They are, instead concentrating elsewhere: consumer products. Exploratory talks are on with Christian Dior, the French fashion products firm, to start a venture in garments and handbags. Meanwhile, the negotiations with Canadian whisky giant Seagram have proved fruitless, and the Modis have turned their attention to a manufacturer of Scotch whisky in Britain. Other consumer products on the agenda include floor cleaners and shiners. The group may launch a bid for Modern Home Care Products, which has joined hands with Johnson Wax of the US and is test marketing the floor cleaner in Bombay.

UNEXPECTED TWIST

THE TUSSLE for the management of Swadeshi Polytex suffered an unexpected twist when Sitaram Jaipuria died last month. Meanwhile, the results of the voting during the shareholders' meeting are still to be announced. But it is understood that the financial institutions, who shifted support from Sitaram Jaipuria to Rajaram Jaipuria at an earlier meeting of shareholders, have shifted back again and deserted Rajaram Jaipuria. Nevertheless, Rajaram Jaipuria had mounted an aggressive proxy-hunting campaign in his bid to gain control of the company, and also won over some key shareholders with substantial holdings.

LOSING HOLD

THE SLOW exodus from the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI) may not mean any immediate loss of status for the premier spokesman of Indian business. But, with Rs 2 crore already committed to adding two floors to its building in the heart of New Delhi, and with departing members signifying a loss of membership revenue, FICCI will almost definitely have to tighten its belt in the near future. The only other option is for the organisation to charge a higher membership fee from its remaining members. But reports from Federation House talk of a freeze on new appointments and of a reassessment of the organisation's finances. The Government may also allow a greater say to other chambers of commerce and industry associations.

AGAINST THE GRAIN

EASTERN India's industrial decline has been well documented; but what has not been realised with the same degree of clarity is the region's accompanying agricultural decline, which has occurred despite the fact that it has an abundance of fertile land. Thus the per capita production of foodgrains in Assam has dropped from 141 kg in 1970-71 to 119 kg a decade later. In the case of Bihar, the drop is from 149 kg to 125 kg and for West Bengal from 179 kg to 152 kg. The simultaneous trend in both north and parts of the south offers a stark contrast.

MINER PROBLEMS

COAL India chairman M.S. Gujral seems to have run into a head wind in his efforts to streamline the working of the coal behemoth and improve worker productivity. As one result, his relations with the Central minister concerned, Vasant Sathe, have dipped to a new low while problems have also cropped up with the Orissa Government. Sathe has objected to the transfer of about a thousand surplus miners from coalfields in the Chindwara area of Madhya Pradesh to other collieries belonging to western coalfields, and has in fact asked the company to recall those workers who have already been transferred. Similarly, Coal India had sought to transfer 500 surplus workers from Bihar to Orissa, following an assessment of surplus manpower in the former and the need for additional hands in the latter. But the Orissa Government has objected strenuously, with the chief minister summoning the local general manager and offering to pay Rs 100 to every worker sent back. The objective: recruitment of workers from Orissa. It remains to be seen whether Gujral sticks to his guns.

New Frontiers

WHAT was once the nation's top industry has fallen on hard times. Over 70 mills are closed nation-wide, throwing almost one lakh workers on the streets, profitability ratios of the industry are lower than the average for most other industries, output has just about inched up over the last six years or so, the per capita cloth available has dropped (see chart), and capacity utilisation has plunged in the same period by 11 per cent. So the textile industry is in sick bay—and it has been put there by mismanagement, high input costs and illegal powerlooms which till recently used to escape the tax man.

All this, however, could soon be a bad memory. The Government has offered the ailing textile industry a ray of hope. Last fortnight, Union Minister of State for Supplies and Textiles Chandrashekhar Singh unwrapped the official remedy for its problems: lower levies on man-made fibres to reduce their prices and encourage their use, permission to textile mills to use any fibre they wish to, and an invitation to powerlooms to register with the Government (with the last budget having shifted duties upstream to yarn which they buy, powerlooms have been left with no incentive to remain out in the cold).

Mills had considerable fibre flexibility before, but they can now go the whole hog and produce only synthetics, which they could not before. And organised sector mills will be placed on an almost equal competitive footing with powerlooms which will have to pay all the taxes they do, though powerlooms still have lower overheads going for them. Exults Prafulbhai Anubhai, managing director of the Ahmedabad-based Rustom Mills: "Competition between the mill and the powerloom sector will now become more fair, and the industry will survive with this newfound competitive strength."

The Government's latest policy package is certainly radical and sharply breaks with the past. Says R. Jagdish Chandran, chairman of the Southern India Mills Association: "No single policy change introduced by the Government in the past three decades has been as sweeping as the new textile policy." Almost two years ago, 13 textile mills were taken over to save workers' jobs. Now the textile policy says that take-overs or nationalisation are not the answer to sickness. Mills have been allowed to expand or contract production capacities, and Government acknowledges that unviable mills may have to down their shutters and jobs can be a casualty in the process.

There is more evidence of the turnabout in official perceptions. Some 40 archaic rules are being done away with, many rooted in war time regulations. And over the past decade taxes on man-made fibres were raised by 450 per cent, excluding levies on petroleum-based inputs. The premise then was that synthetics were for the rich. Now Government wants to lower prices of synthetics because it feels that most people want them. Much of the official turnabout can also be attributed to a feeling that past policies haven't worked. As Textiles Minister Chandrashekhar Singh told INDIA TODAY: "There were certain difficulties with the previous policy. Significant departures from the past were necessary."

Of course, many of the liberalisations are hemmed in with "ifs" and "buts". The reasons for sickness in mills will be evaluated on a case by case basis before a mill is permitted to shut down, and a Government official warns it would be hasty to presume that all the mills closed now will be allowed to call it a day. Also, workers laid off will be provided with a three-year financial cushion that will be funded by levying a cess on the industry's output. The minister says that workers will get 75 per cent of their salary in their first jobless year, 50 per cent in the next year and 25 per cent in the third year. They will also jump the queue for any job vacancies that arise at other units owned by their former employers.

The policy has other, less controversial, proposals. Cotton prices which fluctuate are to be stabilised by the Cotton Corporation of India (CCI) building up a buffer stock and importing cotton. The textile industry is to be regarded activitywise instead of sectorwise, handlooms are to be modernised and protected by reserving some items for them, and the obligation to produce 650 million metres of cloth at controlled prices, now shared equally by the public sector National Textile Corporation (NTC) and handlooms, will be shifted over the next five years to the handlooms sector. Since controlled price cloth production is to go up by 5 per cent a year and is subsidised, that means the subsidy of around Rs 130 crore the Government now foots will go up correspondingly. The shift of controlled price cloth to handlooms also means, Textiles Ministry Secretary S.S Verma argues, that some 30,000 less skilled seasonal handloom weavers who are not covered by any of the official handloom institutions will get employment round the year. Verma claims that NTC mills will not be affected by losing the controlled cloth business. As they modernise over the next five years, the newer machines will be geared to producing higher quality cloth.

That this package is breathtakingly different from the prescriptions of the past is recognised by the Government itself. The final policy document was therefore vetted first by a committee of secretaries, then by a group of Union ministers headed by Defence Minister P.V. Narasimha Rao and finally by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. The report was released for clearance by the cabinet committee on economic affairs only after the prime minister and his advisers discussed it for an hour with the textiles minister.

But the broadsweep policy document has attracted flak for not spelling out how it will be translated into action. Charges G.N. Palriwala, president of the Northern India Cotton Textile Mills Association (NICTMA): "As a policy document, there is much to rejoice in it. But it's a paper full of hope which nowhere mentions how those hopes are going to be implemented and how soon." Adds F.C. Rustagi, president of J.K. Synthetics: "Yes, I am happy with the policy—if it is implemented. I had expected corrective measures to be announced with the policy." But government officials retort that "white papers such as this are never precise and the 1978 and 1981 textile policy statements also did not go into details." In any case, the notifications to enforce the policy will be issued in the next few days and by month-end even the fiscal measures will have been set in motion.

Once that happens, competition, closures and perhaps higher cloth production may be the order of the day. Says a Commerce Ministry official: "When you remove barriers to entry by new firms, competition will be inevitable." Surplus capacities already exist in the industry, and mills that cannot face the pressure will close down. In the near future, eight unviable NTC mills may face the axe, and some of the 74 closed mills could be closed down though many of them may be handed over to new managements.

Convulsions in the industry apart, the policy will have other consequences. With blended fabrics selling more quickly at retail shops than cotton cloth, the few mills that have not yet switched to producing blends will be forced to do so. NICTMA's Palriwala reckons that most mills can make the switch fairly easily in two or three months, though they will have to foot bills of Rs 3 crore or more. And synthetic fibre manufacturers see pickings in an expanded market. Says Mahendra Kumar Modi, Vice-president of Modipon Ltd: "If the Government cuts levies on synthetic fibres drastically, the market will boom." Modipon may quadruple its present annual capacity of 9,000 tonnes of nylon and polyester yarn if the Government permits companies to expand plants. There is evidence it is inclined to do so. Average plant capacities in the country range from 6,000 to 10,000 tonnes, and a government official says that 50,000-tonne plants are required for economies of scale to operate. Almost all the polyester filament yarn and polyester staple fibre manufacturers in the country have applications pending with the Government to expand capacities, and many of these may now be cleared. If they are, that would call for investments in upstream petrochemical-based industries which feed synthetic yarn firms with raw materials. To some extent, such investments are already on the cards; firms have letters of intent in their pockets to expand capacities.

If the Government cuts levies on synthetic fibres drastically, the market will boom.

The policy document is a paper full of hope which nowhere mentions how those hopes are going to be implemented.

G.N. PALRIWALA
president, Northern India Textiles Mills Association

The proposed cut in duties on synthetics should put the Government out of pocket. But official calculations are the production base will expand with more mills switching to lower-taxed synthetics. So revenue the Government rakes in may go up. Says Verma: "It is difficult to predict whether the Government will lose money or not. When the rate of duty goes down, the quantum of revenue may simultaneously go up."

Where the policy could fall flat is on sick units. The decision to permit mills to close rests with state governments, not the centre —state governments could refuse to allow mills to close even though judged unviable by the Centre. Also, the unions may not take kindly to workers being thrown out of work, dole or no dole. Points out Arvind Buch, president of the Textile Labour Association: "Trade unions will have to resist closures if there is no job security for workers." The effectiveness of the CCI in stabilising cotton prices is also questioned. The CCI could face problems in buying cotton for its buffer stock in states which have local bodies with a monopoly on cotton buying.

What is evident is that if the new policy's goals of lower cloth prices and higher output are achieved, the Government's prescription will have been proved right. If the policy fails, the gamble will have been in vain—and will have exacted a heavy toll in terms of mill closures and jobs lost.

SHAW WALLACE

Volte Face

THE SHAW Wallace case gets curiouser and curiouser. Last February, the Calcutta company's directors were asking the Company Law Board to investigate who had bought R.G.Shaw, the overseas company that holds 38.7 per cent of Shaw Wallace shares, and to freeze R.G. Shaw's voting rights pending the enquiry. The Company Law Board obliged, an inspector was deputed to conduct the investigation, and a hearing fixed for June 7.

But when D-day came around, one of the directors of Shaw Wallace got an injunction from the Calcutta High Court that prevented the board from conducting its hearings. As a lawyer in Delhi said, "I have not come across a case before of a company's directors asking for government intervention, and then taking legal steps to prevent such intervention."

The contents of the petition before the high court, and the reasons for the court's order, could not be immediately ascertained. But the substance of the various submissions before the Company Law Board, obtained for the first time by INDIA TODAY, throw fresh and fascinating light on the Shaw Wallace drama, and on the battle being fought between its chairman S.P.Acharya and the proclaimed new owner of R.G.Shaw, the Dubai-based M.R. Chhabria.

The initial complaint to the Company Law Board said that Sime Darby of Malaysia had sold R.G. Shaw to an unidentified party. The sale was termed mysterious and clandestine, and though it purported to be an overseas transaction, the purchase price was mentioned in Indian rupees, so that the real purchaser was believed to be a leading liquor manufacturer in India. If that was the case, control of Shaw Wallace would give the buyer virtual control of the country's liquor business, since Shaw Wallace is the country's second largest liquor company. It was also stated in the submission to the Company Law Board that the transfer of R.G.Shaw's shares really meant buying shares in Shaw Wallace, which amounted to a breach of Indian law as no permission had been taken from the Reserve Bank.

Acting on this complaint, the Company Law Board froze R.G. Shaw's voting rights pending an investigation, and also declared that no change in the Shaw Wallace board could take place.

That set the cat among the pigeons. Chhabria, chairman of Carasco, the Hong Kong company that has bought R.G.Shaw, said in his submission to the Company Law Board two months later that no Indian authority had jurisdiction to investigate transactions by foreign companies abroad, and charged that the initial complaint was based on conjecture and market gossip. There was no violation of Indian laws, and since R.G. Shaw continued to own Shaw Wallace shares as before, its rights as a shareholder could not be frozen.

The Shaw Wallace case is perhaps the first one where a company's directors asked for government intervention, and then took legal steps to prevent such intervention.

But the most interesting part of Chhabria's submission was that the initial complaints had suppressed information from the Company Law Board, that Acharya had known all along that the new owner of R.G. Shaw was Chhabria, and that far from being a clandestine transaction the sale had been done by tender, with the Indian management putting up a nominee to bid.

Also, as early as January 4, that is before the sale took place later in January, Chhabria's lawyer had tried to contact Acharya through his lawyer. A meeting with Acharya was fixed for January 7, but the flights to Calcutta were delayed or cancelled and when Chhabria's lawyer reached the city, Acharya said he was leaving for Bombay.

Chhabria then goes on to charge that Acharya went to Kuala Lumpur and Singapore, accompanied by another director of Shaw Wallace, that the two of them met the chairman of Sime Darby and asked for the opportunity to procure a purchaser for R.G. Shaw. This was agreed to, and a tender floated. But Chhabria's bid was accepted.

Shortly before this, Chhabria called Acharya's lawyer from London, asked for a meeting with Acharya, and added that he had no intention to disturb the company's management, which would stay with professionals. But Acharya remained unwilling to meet Chhabria, saying a meeting would compromise his position in case the new buyer was not Chhabria. When, after Chhabria became the successful bidder, he asked for a fresh meeting, Acharya declined yet again, saying he would not sit on the same board as Chhabria and would fight him. According to Chhabria's submission, Acharya also advised Chhabria to sell R.G. Shaw at a higher price than he had paid.

Chhabria ends his submission by saying that the R.G.Shaw deal was neither mysterious nor clandestine, that Acharya had tried to compel him to sell R.G. Shaw to a foreign multinational corporation, and that his complaint to the Company Law Board was mala fide, and designed to perpetuate his control of a company in which he has no personal stake. He also denied that any Indian liquor manufacturer was involved.

In counter-submissions, Acharya has denied that he went to Kuala Lumpur after June 1984. The company's directors also asked for more information from Chhabria, including a copy of the agreement between Carasco and Sime Darby for the transfer of R.G.Shaw. They also asked for a three-week postponement of the June 7 hearing.

In its reply, the Company Law Board said that all the submissions before it would be taken up for consideration on June 7. But this could not be done because of the high court injunction. At the moment, that is where the matter stands. No interpretation of the future turn of events is immediately possible because the reasons for the court's stay order are not yet known. But it can be predicted that the Shaw Wallace case will develop into a fascinating story of a struggle for the control of one of the leading companies of eastern India.

LIC

Problematic Solution

OFFICIAL policy somersaults are hardly novel, but the way the Government has gone about this one may mark a watershed of sorts. First it accepted the Era Sezhiyan Committee's suggestion that the Life Insurance Corporation of India (LIC) be broken up into five regional companies to decentralise its functioning. Then it shilly-shallied over the matter for months. Finally, it introduced a bill in the last monsoon session of Parliament to translate the proposal into law. Now, four-and-a-half years after the Sezhiyan Committee handed in its controversial report, the Government has quietly dropped the move while continuing to maintain that it has not. Says A.K. Pandya, additional secretary (insurance) in the Finance Ministry's Department of Economic Affairs: "Officially, the move to split the LIC has not been given up. The Government's stand in Parliament is that reintroduction of the bill has been deferred pending its further consideration. The papers will be put up to the Cabinet any time now."

Nevertheless, the Government had already back-tracked on its decision last April, when Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi wrote to Sunil Maitra, joint secretary of the All India Insurance Employees' Association. The prime minister told Maitra: "The Government has reconsidered the matter and decided not to proceed with the bill." Last fortnight, photocopies of the letter were doing the rounds in divisional and branch offices of the LIC.

The letter itself threatens to kick up a storm with Sezhiyan, a former Janata member of Parliament, questioning the propriety of the prime minister informing Maitra of a policy decision while the Lok Sabha was in session. Charges Sezhiyan: "If the Government had decided not to proceed with the bill, it should have informed the Lok Sabha first before officially writing to Sunil Maitra. This shows the slipshod manner in which the Government is proceeding."

Even so, the letter is bound to go down well with LIC employees. They have been fiercely opposing the move to split the monolith. LIC Managing Director A.S. Gupta told INDIA TODAY: "The split would have created more problems than it would have solved." Many policyholders transfer their policies from one area to another, and with each region's business handled by a separate company, confusion would have been the inevitable result. Nor would it have made for commercial viability, he argues. In the north and the east, it costs more to sell insurance policies than in the west and the south. So the northern and eastern companies may not have been viable.

"If the Government had decided not to proceed with the bill it should have informed the Lok Sabha first..."

ERA SEZHIYAN

"The split would have created more problems than it would have solved."

A.S. GUPTA
managing director, LIC

The merits of the proposal apart, what has been overlooked in this brouhaha is that the bill largely took note of only one of the Era Sezhiyan Committee's many recommendations—and did not offer solutions to the LIC's numerous problems. Certainly, it did not address itself to the need to provide insurance cover for the rural and urban poor, or to the fundamental concerns of policyholders such as the low returns on policies. Says Sezhiyan: "I was most unhappy that the bill did not give effect to some of the more important recommendations of our committee."

The committee's report had indicted the LIC on a number of counts. One goal of nationalising private insurance firms in 1956 was to spread life insurance to rural areas and among the poor, but the LIC has concentrated more on the urban well-to-do. The number of new policies it has issued in the countryside over the last 20 years has actually declined. And a recent survey by the National Council of Applied Economic Research shows that while 35.1 per cent of the salaried class in the country are insured, only 2.3 per cent of self-employed farmers are covered by insurance.

The Sezhiyan Committee pre-empted the argument that the poor cannot afford the premia on policies. It suggested that the LIC promote the much cheaper group insurance policies more vigorously, raise the group insurance policy limit of Rs 10,000 and issue one-shot premium policies to farmers who do not have a fixed income. The LIC could issue a policy to a district cooperative bank covering all farmers who borrow money from it, and the bank could collect the premium along with the interest on the loans.

The bill also blithely overlooked the most contentious issue of them all—the raw deal that the LIC gives its policyholders. The net yield on an LIC insurance policy is less than 7 per cent a year, which falls short of what is offered by the Provident Fund authorities, the banks, the post office, the Unit Trust of India or private firms which hold out anything between 10 and 15 per cent for deposits.

The LIC's answer to all this is that its policies are not an investment but a hedge against "life risks". In any case, the corporation is hamstrung by the Government in offering policyholders better returns: 75 per cent of its money has to be put into low-yielding government securities.

But these arguments are clearly invalid. The LIC itself admits in its actuarial calculations that its insurance policies are investment propositions. For example, its charts say that just 3.3 per cent of the annual premium goes for covering the risk of death; most of the premium represents plain investment, on which there should be a better return.

Also, as LIC officials admit, when the company's actuaries calculate the premia to be charged on policies, they assume that most people will live for less than half the time they really do. In addition to that they also deflate the estimate of LIC returns on investments by half and double estimates of expenses and overheads. So the LIC, in fact, is flush with funds: about Rs 3 crore goes into its reserves everyday.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The only redeeming feature in all this is that the corporation has been trying to decentralise its functioning by installing 300 mini-computers at some of its 1,042 branches, as well as at its divisional offices. Explains LIC Executive Director (organisation, management and corporate planning) M.G. Diwan: "The basis of our decentralisation is to move decision-making from the central office to the zonal offices, to the divisional offices and finally to the branches." He says that 41 of the 43 divisional offices are functioning almost independently, and that the Bombay and Calcutta divisional offices will follow suit very soon.

But even the LIC's decentralisation efforts could run into squally weather. The unions fear that widespread computerisation will displace staff, though this has not happened so far. They question the wisdom of investing a staggering Rs 15 lakh in each computer when over 40,000 clerks in LIC offices nation-wide service the corporation's 252 lakh insurance policies.

On an average, a clerk has to handle only 680 policies a year—or two policies a day. And N.M. Sundaram, joint secretary of the All India Insurance Employees' Association, warns that decentralisation could be counter-productive in another sense. He argues: "There is a danger in making branches totally self-sufficient to handle policies. Branches are basically business procurement centres, and if all claims are going to be settled at the branches, there is bound to be cheating and fraud."

That may or may not become a serious problem, but what is evident is that, with the bill to split the LIC having been dropped, the Government is back to square one. The ills that flow from a firm's functioning in a monopoly situation continue unchecked, the policyholder continues to be taken for a ride, and the four-and-a-half-year-old efforts of a committee set up to prescribe remedies quietly and possible solutions have been consigned to the dustbin.

FILM IMPORTS

Dull Picture

LAST fortnight when David Lean's long-awaited and Oscar-winning film A Passage to India was premiered in New Delhi in aid of the prime minister's relief fund, Indian audiences were at last hopeful of a better deal in getting to see the latest foreign films soon after their commercial release in the West. Alas, the situation is not as simple as that. It may be weeks, even months, before A Passage to India is released commercially, and the problem lies not with importer-distributor quarrels but with the Government's new policy of permitting film imports by non-resident Indians (NRI's).

Under the new film import policy initiated October last, foreign films can be imported for commercial screening in the country by NRI's after a payment of a canalising fee of US $ 10,000 per film to the National Film Development Corporation (NFDC) and 15 per cent of the overflow in profits, if any. The Government embarked upon the policy in good faith: it did not wish to restrict its import via the all-powerful Motion Pictures Export Association of America (MPEAA) and at the same time did not wish profits to be repatriated abroad.

So far, applications for the import of 54 films by NRI's have landed at the NFDC's offices in Bombay, but their quality is another matter altogether. The films include titles like Nine Deaths of the Ninja, Body Rock and Chain Gang. Indian tennis player Ashok Amritraj, who is based in Los Angeles, has applied to import six films including such B-grade masterpieces as Avenging Jungle and Razor Back. Three 3-D films (A.P.E., The Fantastic Invasion of the Earth and Lonely Lady) are also in the pipeline but NFDC Managing Director Malati Tambay Vaidya admits that she holds no brief for the artistic or aesthetic merits of the NRI imports. That the Government has legitimised the import of third-rate dross is clear, and already a subject of dispute between the NFDC and the Ministry of Information & Broadcasting in New Delhi.

According to the ministry, the NFDC was clearly deputed with the responsibility of ensuring that the imports were of "the highest thematic, aesthetic and cinematic standards". Accordingly, Tambay Vaidya says she invited members of the NFDC board—film makers Shashi Kapoor, Shyam Benegal and Basu Bhattacharya as well as distributor Gulshan Rai—to arbitrate over the selection. The group cleared only Lonely Lady, and thought it was "meaningless" to sit in judgement over the rest, given their appalling standard. "We now feel that the NFDC is in no position to decide on the quality of film imports. Why shouldn't the Censor Board take on the responsibility?" says Vaidya. But the ministry argues that the NFDC, being the sole financial beneficiary of the scheme, it should also take in hand the quality of the films being imported.

Meanwhile, the sole import of any value, A Passage to India, has run into problems for release. A single print was imported by Dass Media. The company now says that there is a shortage of raw stock to make more prints but the NFDC (which is again the sole agency for distributing raw stock) denies this. "They simply haven't applied for raw stock," says Vaidya. Undeterred the importer is trying to clinch the best deals for distributing the film nation-wide.

A still from A Passage to India: in short supply

In this picture of confusion and disarray, the only promise of decent cinematic fare is provided by the MPEAA, which has an excellent selection of recent Hollywood films coming up for release in the next couple of months. Titles include the prize-winning Ghostbusters and A Soldier's Story, Educating Rita and The Razor's Edge. As a stopgap arrangement it will also release new prints of some old blockbusters such as Rear Window, Vertigo, Guns of Navarone and Ben Hur.

Novopan presents all the excitement of Executive Class!

Was it the airlines who decided that the executive deserved to be put in a separate class?

It doesn't really matter who started it. The fact is that most companies today treat it as a ground rule.

So who adds this touch of class?

Perhaps there's no candidate for the job with as much all-round potential as Novopan. Novopan is the only pre-laminated particle board in the country. It's pre-laminated on two sides. Ready for the job.

This means your office panelling can go up almost overnight.

There's no disruption of work. And look at the choice. A range of wood finishes — teak, rosewood, oak... whatever you would! As well as a variety of colours and designs.

For doors too, there's nothing like it. You can order just the size you need. And shut the door on the problem!

Novopan is great for tables, cabinets, bookshelves... everything. You can choose between regular Novopan and phenol-bonded Novopan Exterior. So you can use it indoors and outdoors.

And here's the final qualification to clinch the appointment.

Novopan doesn't cost the earth. As a matter of fact, it costs less than those one-sided laminate and plywood combinations.

Novopan — for all the excitement of Executive Class.

WIMCO

Matchless Future

WIMCO Ltd is a company that manufactures matchboxes. Right? In less than a decade, the answer to that question could be "maybe". One out of every five matchboxes made in the country bears the Wimco label; in five years only one out of 10 or 15 may do so. But, strange as it may seem, that possibility does not appear to dismay the company's management. After years of match making, Wimco has seen the writing on the wall and is currently involved in an ambitious programme of diversification. It is consequently one giant company which seems to be successfully making a transition from traditional to new fields of activity.

The dice were loaded against it when the Government fixed a ceiling for Wimco and levied penal rates of excise on its matchbox. So Wimco decided to cut loose from a business it has been in for 60 years. Its new course will take it to such products as titanium metal anodes, a component of the electrolytic cells used to turn out some chemicals, packaging materials, processed foods and vegetables, farm extension services, biotechnology and the frontiers of the agro business. Explains the company's Vice-Chairman and Managing Director Kamaljit Singh: "From a consumer product company, we are becoming an agro-based firm. We have to be prepared for the fact that matchboxes won't be our mainstay for long."

There are signals that Wimco's gamble is beginning to pay off. Profits at Rs 5.8 crore and dividends at 20 per cent are at new highs, sales have shot up to over Rs 105 crore, and last month the firm's Rs 10 share was quoted at Rs 48 on the stock-market. Says a Wimco watcher: "For a company that has weathered a crisis, a 6 per cent rate of return on sales is not to be considered a bad performance."

Certainly, the company has pulled out of the tailspin it was flung into by Charan Singh's budget six years ago. On the premise that handmade is beautiful, the excise duty on the mechanised sector's (read Wimco) wooden and cardboard matchboxes was sharply stepped up, while the duty on semi-mechanised, medium and tiny firms was cut (see chart). That meant that Wimco's excise and sales tax bill more than doubled to Rs 22 crore a year after the 1979 budget. The burden was passed to wholesalers and retailers, sales plummeted by 20 to 25 per cent, matchboxes piled up in warehouses and its working capital shot up. Inevitably, Wimco slashed matchbox production by some 10 per cent, and its seven match factories worked at lower rates of efficiency. Two of them were nearly shut down. Profits were squeezed, though that showed up on the balance sheets only a year or two later, ready cash became a problem, and borrowings went up to Rs 25 crore. Workers were laid off, Wimco shares plunged to Rs 10 a few months after the 1979 budget (two years before, they had been sold for Rs 13.25 when the company came out with a public issue), and major plans to branch out into meat exports and the manufacture of agricultural chemicals were shelved. The management also went slow on projects it had launched before 1979, though these eventually helped the company turn the corner. Admits Wimco's Singh: "The company would have gone into liquidation had we not taken steps before 1979 to diversify. What was in the pipeline saved us."

Charts by B.K. SHARMA

To help retrieve the situation, the company swung into action on a number of fronts. In matches, factories were geared to produce more higher quality cardboard matchboxes, which require less labour than wooden ones. As a fallout of this, the match division's 8,000-strong labour force had to be pruned. Some 1,100 workers were sent packing through an early voluntary retirement scheme which held out to each worker Rs 30,000 plus legal dues. And the company ventured into new areas of business, sticking all the while to three ground rules: the technology had to be readily available from its foreign partner Swedish Match Company or its associates; the new project had to be allied to its traditional line of business so that the company would not be at sea in it; and the project had to require small sums of investment (Wimco has put only Rs 7 crore into diversification since 1978). So it bought or put up three small fruit and vegetable processing firms, Sun Sip, Chandigarh Foods and Cleanfoods Corporation, a packaging machines company called AR Packaging Systems, and Wimco Seedlings, formally floated early last year to breed genetically superior trees, fruits and vegetables.

Underpinning all this is a basic perception—the importance of sewing up raw material supplies. To have wood on tap for its match factories, the company last year handed out four lakh saplings to farmers in the north under a scheme administered by the state-owned National Bank for Agriculture and Rural Development. That takes the total number of trees Wimco has given farmers to plant to a million—enough wood to meet half its match stick needs from 1990 onwards.

With all this on the anvil, and bigger projects in sight in the next few years, Wimco may scale new heights, match division or no match division.

GUJARAT

The Raid Reversal

MASSIVE tax raids are known to get the adrenalin flowing, but this one had blood flowing as well. And before the action died down, no fewer than 40 excise officials were in hospital, one of them had facial burns after a chemical was thrown at him in Century Mills, and in a reversal of roles the excise men began beating up businessmen during subsequent interrogations. To add to the unprecedented drama, some of Surat's biggest textile magnates were arrested for having instigated the violence, and questions were inevitably being asked about the nexus between the local industry and the city's police and excise establishments. All in all, there was enough to justify a big budget Hindi film.

But the budget here was of course far bigger than any film's. Reports had been piling up in New Delhi's Directorate of Revenue Intelligence about large-scale tax evasion by Surat's textile producers and traders, but the Government was galvanised into action only after press reports estimated the evasion at as high as Rs 500 crore. The name of the game was classifying cloth wrongly so as to pay a lower rate of excise duty, or to stamp the same number on different bales of cloth so that the excise paid on one bale helped clear many bales, or to use any of a number of other ingenious stratagems.

So the raid that was mounted was one of the biggest in the history of the excise department. No fewer than 435 officials divided into 48 raiding parties converged on Surat from three different originating points, their target initially being the massive textile market on Surat's Ring Road, with 1,200 shops. Secrecy was so complete that even the local excise officials were kept in the dark, and no police protection was considered necessary because, as one official put it, "We thought we had strength in our sheer numbers."

They were hopelessly wrong, of course. As the officials strode confidently into the shops and began checking documents, there was at first no reaction except compliance. But when the size and scale of the raids became apparent, the hundreds of shops dealing in wholesale cloth began to clang down their shutters as panic spread. And then, before officials could fathom what was happening, henchmen materialised out of nowhere and started attacking the raiding parties with pipes and sticks. The documents that had been seized were snatched back and immediately destroyed. In some textile mills, the documents were thrown into boilers, where instant incineration destroyed all evidence completely.

The vilest of abuses were flung at the officials, most of whom ran for their lives, often leaving behind watches, wallets and gold chains. Hostile slogans rent the air: Excise department hai hai, Rajiv Gandhi murdabad, Rajiv Gandhi yeh nahin chalega. The traders were openly directing their men to specific officials, and one official heard a gang leader telling a trader that they were now moving out of the market so as to "take care" of another raiding party at a textile mill.

C.P. Arya, an assistant director of anti-evasion, was saved from a mob by hutment dwellers who gave him shelter. But he was among the lucky ones. Many of the others finally managed to find their way to the Pandasera police station, only to find that the police were not prepared to record their complaints. Surat Police Commissioner Manmohan Mehta argued that the police were already busy maintaining peace in the city because of the anti-reservation agitation, that constables could not as a consequence be immediately taken off duty, that the raid was badly timed because of this reason, and that the police should have been informed in advance. But this did not explain why policemen were reluctant to register the officials' complaints. The local officials' attitude changed somewhat after Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh got on the telephone to Chief Minister Madhavsinh Solanki. But many excise officials chose to return to Bombay, where their counterparts sported black armbands in protest at the incidents in Surat.

NEVERTHELESS, the raids continued after a break of 24 hours. This crucial time-lag almost certainly helped numerous traders and industrialists destroy incriminating evidence or to manipulate their records, but R.Bhattacharjee, the deputy director of anti-evasion who led the raid, remained confident: "We picked up all the documents and will meticulously decipher each one to piece together the evidence," he said. Bhattacharjee had in fact stood out in the opening day's drama for his display of personal bravery. When his men were attacked in the textile market, the tall bald officer rushed to the troublespot with a handful of armed men from the Directorate of Revenue Intelligence and Customs and stood like a rock in the midst of the chaos and directed the operations. When he heard of acid being thrown at an official in Century Mills, he rushed there to help and seize the available documents.

The raids and the violence brought to the surface deep fissures in Surat's textile industry, with a major section decrying the violence and refusing to take part in the subsequent protest. In part, this is because of a rift between the two dominant communities in the business —Gujaratis and Marwaris—and the fact that most of the raids happened to be on Marwari establishments. Said Rajnikant Sheth, president of the Textile Association of India, south Gujarat unit: "The trade here has always had a reputation of being peace-loving, now this attack has destroyed our image." Other Gujarati businessmen shared this sentiment, and when the Garden Mills was raided, the owners fully cooperated with the excise officials, who seized reportedly unaccounted goods worth about Rs 1.76 lakh. Despite this, there was not a murmur of protest. Said a senior manager of the mill: "How can we protest or beat them up? They are doing their duty and they can come back and check our mill any day they want." Many traders who were raided were calling for meetings to voice their protest, but a majority of the business community kept away, not wanting to be a party to condemning the excise raid. The South Gujarat Chamber of Commerce and Industry was also unusually silent, and a local businessman said: "Outsiders have changed the business norms here. Traditional Gujarati businessmen would never have indulged in such violence." The rift implicit in all this came out into the open last fortnight when the Marwari lobby demanded the resignation of Surajram Bachkaniwala, president of the Surat Textile Market and Warehousing Society, as he did not condemn the raid.

Suspicion now dogs textile business circles in the city. The Marwari group suspects that their Gujarati counterparts were behind the raids, while the latter thinks that rival traders and businessmen in Bombay and Ahmedabad may have tipped off the excise establishment and provoked them into taking action. Whatever the truth of the matter, the excise officials themselves have no doubt in their minds that large-scale evasion has in fact been taking place in Surat. Said one of them: "It is by unscrupulous methods like tax evasion that the trade here in Surat has flourished and become so prominent."

There is also little doubt that the Surat textile business has been acting in collusion with the city's tax officials. The story is told of a Young Assistant Collector of customs, Karan Sharma, who was transferred because he raided the residence of a well-connected industrialist in the city three years ago. The industrialist had challenged Sharma, who seized contraband, and warned him that he would soon be out of Surat; and true enough, marching orders were soon issued, banishing Sharma to Bikaner. This time around, however, nemesis caught up with the industrialist, whose mill was raided, unaccounted cloth seized and documents taken into custody.

Meanwhile, as if to atone for the initial lack of support, the local police swung into action and arrested half-a-dozen well-known businessmen and millowners who are charged with having engineered the attack along with 42 others, and with violating the Excise and Salt Tax Act. Among the businessmen arrested were Ashok Chotalal Shah, Vinod Kumar and Ashok Garg of Hariom Textiles, Hundan Devnani and Lekhraj Madhwani of B.N. Prints, Ramesh Jain of Nemtex Textiles and Om Prakash Jain of Salu Textiles. This sent shock waves through the Surat industry, with over 80 major traders and industrialists securing anticipatory bail from the Gujarat High Court. And though the arrested businessmen were subsequently released on bail that went up to Rs 50,000, the traders were sufficiently annoyed to close down all the textile markets in Surat for 10 days, paralysing all business activity. In a city that is almost dominated by the textile business, this meant that over a lakh of people were unemployed, while more than 100 transport companies operating out of the city had to look for work in other sectors. And the absence of payments from traders created its own problems.

The unexpected fall-out of the entire episode was the reaction of some of the excise officials, who could not restrain themselves from giving some businessmen a sound thrashing during their interrogation. Prakash Nandkishore Gupta said in a statement to the Chief Judicial Magistrate, M.D.Dhruv, in Surat that he was mercilessly beaten and insulted by excise officers.

This provoked comments from millowners that had a rare quality of honesty about them. Said one: "They (the excise officials) got a beating because they deserved it. What did they expect? We cough up thousands of rupees paying them regular bribes and giving them expensive gifts, and then they come and raid our mills. Obviously, this angered us. There has to be some ethics. We may not be clean, but nor are they." That extraordinary comment coming after extraordinary events, can have no riposte. —RAMESH MENON in Surat

The tyres we race are the tyres you buy

It's true! The very same tyres that you use on city-roads, are repeatedly tested by MRF on race and rally tracks around the country.

There's a simple reason why. On a race-track a tyre is subjected to severe torture and strain. In just six hours on the track, a tyre goes through more than half its life. Something that would take more than a year on a city road.

Which means we get our test results that much faster. And you get an improved product that much quicker.

It's a testing technique developed by our collaborators B F Goodrich of the USA, people who build tyres for the NASA Space Shuttle Programme.

And since MRF tests city-tyres on the race-track, you can be sure that when we win, you too are winning. With tyres that are setting new standards for grip, handling, mileage, durability and sheer staying power.

At the end of the race, it's over to the MRF technicians... Testing for heat build-up in a tyre with an electronic pyrometer.

SOFT DRINK MIXES

An Instant Success

TRINKA, Ju-C, Florida, Marina: suddenly, metropolitan grocery shop shelves are chockful of them. Where Pioma Industries' Rasna had ruled in profitable splendour for seven years, a clutch of new instant soft drink mixes is vying for consumer attention.

It is the middle and lower middle classes who are patronising Ju-C.

K.S. RANGARAJ
executive director, Kothari General Foods

Lured by the attractions of a largely untapped market, at least three firms have launched rival products. Corn Products, which makes the Rex range of squashes, has re-launched Trinka after several years, Kothari General Foods Corporation has tied up with US food giant General Foods Corporation to introduce its Ju-C and has invaded the capital after hawking its multi-flavour product in Bombay last summer, and HMM Ltd of Horlicks fame is test marketing its Florida in Delhi. Other firms too are eyeing the pickings. McDowell and Company, which turns out the Dipy's and Kissan range of squashes, and Food Specialities Ltd, the Maggi Noodles company, may be waiting in the wings to see how the others fare before taking the plunge.

Certainly, most have so far done themselves proud in the marketplace. Kothari has rung up sales of Rs 2.5 crore in Delhi, almost 60 per cent of the turnover it expects this year, and is readying to notch up a turnover of about Rs 15 crore next year when Ju-C goes national. HMM too may offer its Florida all over the country next year, and is shooting for Rs 20 crore to Rs 30 crore sales of its powder orange drink. And quite some lengths ahead of the pack is instant drink mix pioneer Pioma, which sells some Rs 17 crore worth of Rasna annually.

At the moment, there is room for everyone in a growing market. Reckons an industry executive: "The total soft drink market, excluding sodas, is worth about Rs 400 crore; 80 per cent of these sales take place outside the home. And it is growing by 15 to 20 per cent a year."

So the instant soft drink mix market is all set for a boom. The big question is: why now? The answer, food industry men say, is applicable to most processed foods: the times are a-changing. Disposable incomes are up and consumers may be willing to experiment with new brands. Pioma Chief Executive Ashok Vithlani claims that the spadework done by his firm has played a part in making instant soft drink mixes acceptable to the public—and this now helps the competition. Says Vithlani: "Thanks to Rasna winning the confidence of people, most have come to accept soft drink concentrates as an acceptable source of daily refreshment."

It is true that powder drink mixes are going down well with the buyer and that they did not do so before. Most of the ready-to-drink wares that hit the market after Pioma launched Rasna in 1978 have faded into oblivion while low-priced Rasna kept going. Food Specialities, for one, launched Paloma a year after Rasna was introduced in the market and came a cropper. It spent around Rs 35 lakh a year on promoting it, though it sold just Rs 20 lakh of the powder tea drink annually, till finally the company decided to call it quits last year. And Corn Products withdrew Trinka some years ago because, industry men believe, it did not make much headway in the market.

"Squash manufacturers will reassess marketing strategies, something that is done in any situation. We'll protect our flanks."

KISAN MEHTA
president, McDowell's food and beverages division

Some firms may also have wanted to mark time till they hit upon the right product. HMM Marketing Manager Pradip K. Chanda says that this was the case with his firm, which has a tie up with Beecham of the UK. Lastly, industry executives point out that bottled fizz at almost Rs 2 is now more expensive than a glass of instant drink mix.

That is certainly true. The price-tag for a glass of Florida is Rs 1.25. A glass of Ju-C, Trinka or Rasna costs even less: 50 paise, 36 paise and 35 paise, respectively—though these hinge on the prevailing price of sugar. The price difference may offer a clue as to why firms have not so far been treading on one another's toes. HMM's Florida is an upmarket product; Ju-C is looking to the middle range. Says K.S. Rangaraj, executive director of Kothari General Foods: "It is the middle and lower middle classes who are patronising Ju-C." But, Trinka and Rasna may be sticking to down market buyers. Says Kisan Mehta, president of McDowell's food and beverages division: "It's a classic case of market segmentation."

For all that, the players in the instant drink market are hedging their bets. Many are spending 10 to 15 per cent of their expected turnover on pushing their wares in a high impulse buying market. Explains an industry executive: "It is the amount of media noise you make that makes the difference."

Others out of the immediate game have been looking afresh at market positions. Bottled soft drinks which are largely sold outdoors remain unaffected, but squash manufacturers could be squeezed. They claim that this has not happened because the new drinks are artificially flavoured and contain no fruit juice. Not everyone shares this assessment, and even McDowell's Mehta says: "Squash manufacturers will reassess marketing strategies, something that is done in any situation. We'll protect our flanks."

The competition offered by the big daddies of the food industry could hit Pioma too, though its chief executive dismisses the possibility. Most of the new drinks use powder technology which, he claims, is inferior to using a liquid base. Rasna has nine flavours, some tailored to local tastes, and a tenth will soon be on the market. But Rasna has scored on its low price, and Trinka could give it a run for its money. So while the immediate outlook for instant drink firms may be rosy, a convulsion in the industry in the long run cannot be ruled out.

BIHAR

Bank Blues

WHAT IS the effect on a state if four employees of a bank are transferred? The answer in Bihar last fortnight was quite stunning: Rs 300 crore worth of cheques held up, the Patna clearing house paralysed, trade in the state grinding to a halt, salary cheques not cashed, and prices of a variety of items shooting up while others become scarce on the market. No economy can function without the free flow of money, and the transfer of four bank employees proved this conclusively.

The four transferred employees of the State Bank of India (SBI) belong to the powerful Bihar Provincial Bank Employees Association (BPBEA), which gave a call to its members in the other nationalised banks to boycott all SBI documents and instruments throughout Bihar from May 3. Result: the Patna clearing house for cheques was paralysed, and with the SBI management refusing to buckle under what it called economic terrorism, an unpecedented financial crises resulted.

The BPBEA charged that the transfers were vindictive and meant to prevent the growth of the organisation and some transfers had been cancelled when membership of the union was given up. But SBI spokesmen said transfers were cancelled only on compassionate grounds.

At one stage, the state Government feared a serious law and order problem, and Prabhat Kumar Prasad, secretary of the Bihar Chamber of Commerce, asked the Government to invoke the National Security Act to "curb trade union terrorism". The Bihar Chamber of Commerce in fact organised an angry demonstration in front of the local Reserve Bank of India (RBI) office, holding it responsible for the crisis when it refused to intervene. The demonstration was joined by a host of other chambers.

Protest rally outside RBI

State Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey was sufficiently alarmed by the developments to send repeated SOS messages to the Finance Ministry in New Delhi and the RBI governor in Bombay. Numerous businessmen in Patna were meanwhile talking of possible industrial violence because salaried employees were unable to encash their pay cheques.

The state Governor, P. Venkatasubbiah, also chipped in with his efforts and convened a meeting of government officials, the local RBI manager and trade spokesmen. But this had little immediate effect. A suggestion was made that the State Bank could be excluded from the clearing house so that the other banks could function, but this was shot down by the RBI representative on the grounds that the problem did not lie with the clearing house and that the State Bank had not violated any rule. While technically correct, this amounted to a continuation of stalemate and industry spokesmen began focussing their ire on the RBI.

Meanwhile, the Bihar Chemists and Druggists Association said that the state was definitely heading for an acute drugs shortage because manufacturers and wholsalers operating outside the state did not want to send supplies, as their payment would be held up. And a parallel banking system seemed to be emerging in pockets, with people pulling money out of fixed deposit accounts to lend in the informal money market, which was suddenly hyper-active. The public mood was summed up by the normally sober Patna daily, The Searchlight, which said editorially that the bank employees' behaviour was worse than that of criminals. Finally, towards the end of last week, the clearing house reopened after Dubey appealed to the BPBEA. But the backlog of problems would take time to be sorted out.

At a time when we could have been satisfied with just one field, we opened our doors to seek new horizons.

At Vulcan-Laval we believe in growth through dynamism. A few years ago it was a dream for Vulcan-Laval to become a multi-dimension, forty-crore turnover Company, having technological collaborations with leading world class industries. Today it is a reality!

Every stage of our growth has been carefully planned and successfully implemented, with the same efficiency and commitment, as are the projects we undertake for our clients.

Today our horizon spreads from supply of individual equipment to complete turnkey projects. Our process equipment ranges from Centrifugal Separators to Plate Heat Exchangers, from Dryers and Evaporators to Homogenizers, from Refrigeration Compressors to custom designed equipment fabricated from exotic metals.

Our Project Management capability ranges from Dairy to Brewery, from Processed foods to Vegetable oils, from Mineral oil purification to Central cooling systems in power stations and steel plants.

We have grown a great deal in the last four decades. Our unsatiated need for diversification will lead us from one landmark to the next, all the way to newer and newer horizons.

WE ARE THE PROJECT MANAGEMENT EXPERTS.

THERE IS still no sign of inflation—wholesale prices dipped again last fortnight. Industry, never too healthy, suffered a further setback last month chiefly because of a fall in manufacturing output. Another disturbing factor was the fall in power generation even after accounting for the seasonal drop. Credit conditions in the economy were easy and the boom in bullion prices has been checked.

All data are seasonally adjusted. The current trend is computed on the basis of the past six months data to which a regression is fitted.

Wholesale prices were down again last fortnight, by 0.3 per cent, mainly because of a fall in the prices of primary goods.

Industrial production dipped by 0.7 per cent last month. A rise in mining and quarrying activity was offset by a drop in manufacturing output.

Sharp drops in electrical machinery, textiles and transport equipment to a disturbing 1.7 per cent drop in manufacturing output.

Increase in bank credit to firms and government and in foreign exchange assets led to a 0.7 per cent rise in money supply last fortnight.

Credit conditions were easy last fortnight with bank credit to firms increasing by 1.2 per cent, way over the long-term trend.

Share prices were temporarily checked after a boom of over several weeks. Tea plantation and chemical fertilisers were major contributors.

A sharp drop in hydel generation has contributed to a 0.8 per cent drop in the generation of power last fortnight.

Gold prices, imitating share price movements, dropped 0.7 per cent last fortnight indicating a reversal of a bullish trend.

The amazing low cost electric typewriter that's challenging the best in the West.

The electric typewriter has finally come of age.

Between the two extremes of manual typewriter technology with its tedious time-consuming operation, and its electronic counterpart with its exorbitant cost and maintenance, stands the electric typewriter. The ideal choice which offers economy, speed, convenience, ease of operation and maintenance, typically suited to the Indian environment.

The Gem Juki Professional 3500 is part of the new breed of Japanese heavy-duty typewriters. An ingenious design incorporates all the advantages of an interchangeable golf ball typewriter without two obvious disadvantages. Bulk and Cost. The result is a strong, reliable body and years of trouble-free performance.

Discover the speed of electricity at your fingertips through some of the special features of the Professional 3500.

- Easily interchangeable golf balls for full versatility in document preparation. Now you can use the typeface of your choice.
- A stationary carriage helps save space. A boon in crowded offices.
- The correcting key on the keyboard lets you correct original copies as a normal part of the typing function.
- Seven repeat function keys increase speed and efficiency.
- A moving indicator gives visual indication to user, to adjust the right side of the paper.
- A cassette ribbon eliminates any contact with ribbon. Thus eliminates smudges.
- A special print memory function that completely eliminates accidental overstriking.

The Professional 3500 incorporates a host of other exclusives, at almost half the cost of other typewriters in this category.

THE MARKETS

High Point

THE GODS in the heavens and the demigods who run the stock exchanges came together last fortnight to wish investors and share prices well. And as stock values kept rising, the supergods in the Government chipped in with policy announcements on specific industries, sending prices rising further.

The timely arrival of the south-western monsoons heralded another good agricultural year, and the controller of capital issues in New Delhi unbent after a marathon, five-hour meeting with the heads of the four major stock exchanges, and announced a new set of margins for business done in specified shares. Bulls on the market got two more concessions: the penal margins on highly speculative shares were lowered and the number of scrips attracting these margins was also reduced.

With these and other relaxations indicating change of heart on the part of the Government, which had looked askance at the upsurge on the markets, the bulls virtually ran amuck. There had been a momentary sag earlier in the rising price curve, but this soon gave way to renewed buying. Glamour stock like Hindustan Motors, Tata Ordinary, TELCO and Premier Automobiles advanced to new peaks. And just when the tide seemed to have reached its high point, the Government came out with its new policy package for the textile industry, reduced the levy quota for the cement industry and delicensed a host of pharmaceutical products. After that, nothing could keep the bulls at bay.

The share prices of companies producing synthetic fibre and yarn suddenly looked rosier once the textile policy was announced, including the promise of lower taxes, lifting of licensing restrictions and flexibility in fibre use. However, there was disappointment over the absence of a price increase for cement, though the reduction in the levy quota should help companies return improved results. There was also the mysterious and inexplicable rise in the prices of DCM shares in Delhi, and no one seemed any the wiser about the identity of the bulls active on this battered front.

There may be still more good news in store. The prime minister seems set to conclude successful visits to France and the US and there is likely to be an understanding on the details of Indian access to high technology available in the US. So shares are in full bloom, and have brought handsome rewards to those who bought in this year.

The big question, of course, is how long the boom will last. At the moment, there seems nothing that can bring about a regrouping of the bears, who are still in hiding. But everything that goes up must come down, and the sharp-eyed will have to watch carefully for the dip in the rising curve that could be something more than a momentary hiccup.

NATIONAL SECURITY BOARD

Doctrine for Danger

SARDAR Patel Bhawan on New Delhi's Parliament Street, one of the many bureaucratic beehives in the vicinity of the Central Secretariat, is humming with vigorous new activity after the moving in of the incipient secretariat of the National Security Board. But more than the formation of yet another government department, the excitement is about the kind of change this signifies in the country's security doctrine, perhaps the biggest since the 1962 war with China.

The board is an apex intelligence body, constituted more or less on the lines of the American National Security Council. It will be chaired by the prime minister and will include the heads of the Intelligence Bureau (IB) and Research and Analysis Wing (RAW), some key functionaries from home and defence ministries, chief ministers of two of the most sensitive states in the country—which in present context could only mean Punjab and Assam—and K. Subrahmanyam, director of the Institute of Defence Studies and Analysis. Subrahmanyam is an IAS officer who once headed the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC). Administratively, the board will be run by R.K. Khandelwal, a police officer who has been appointed member-secretary to the board. An intelligence veteran who rose to be a joint director in the IB and then an inspector general with the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF), Khandelwal has been placed on level in the intelligence hierarchy with the directors of IB and RAW.

The new organisation is in a way meant to take over the role that the two JIC's, external and internal, were meant to play so far. That is, collating data and information sent in by all the intelligence agencies, their assessment and operational analysis. Based on these, the new agency will also identify and form threat perceptions and reshape the national strategic doctrine.

This is comparable with similar systems in the US where the National Security Council backs up all strategic decision-making at the White House and in UK where a JIC evaluates all reports sent in by security agencies and reports to the Cabinet. "In India," said a senior official, "this role was meant to be performed by the two JIC's. The current change stems from their failure to do so."

For this officials blame the way the JIC's, which may be scrapped now, were made to function. Intelligence agencies submit reports directly to the prime minister and user ministries while just marking copies to the JIC's. Consequently often the user ministries get the JIC assessments after they had already acted on the basis of the original reports.

Sardar Patel Bhawan

HARI OM GULATI

Since the National Security Board will include top functionaries of all security organisations and be headed by the prime minister, there will be more accountability.

The JIC's have also been marred by fundamental contradictions. Shortly after the 1962 war a JIC led by T.N. Kaul was formed to assess both internal and external intelligence. Later, with the growth in intelligence infrastructure it was split into two. But never along the decades was any JIC a body with teeth. It could neither question intelligence agencies nor make demands on them.

In fact, unhappiness with the functioning of the system has been put on record by more than one JIC chief. Says an officer: "In intelligence circles we always quote the old example where the JIC got worked up by a fresh, inexplicable Chinese troop build-up in the Aksai Chin area. But the noise the JIC made did not seem to affect the army the least. It was later found that the Chinese build-up was only a reaction to the Indian army advancing some of its units closer to the border. The army understood this all along but did not take into confidence an organisation believed to be of no consequence."

Some of this is going to change now. Since the National Security Board will include top functionaries of all security organisations and be headed by the prime minister, there will be more accountability. Further, integrating the assessment of external and internal intelligence could lead to better threat perceptions and operational planning. There is still a school of thought which wants the retention of an integrated JIC to feed the board. But with the kind of clout that the board is being given that will be more of an academic question.

The new body will also initiate a process of rethinking on the entire security and intelligence structure. The prime minister is believed to be upset with the ease with which Punjab terrorists have been able to hoodwink the IB. At least internally this job, which includes infiltrating extremist organisations and getting inside information, has so far been performed by the state police special branches. But now the IB is being increasingly asked to do so, particularly in Punjab. "One stumbling-block earlier was that law and order is a state subject and state governments would react adversely to such 'autonomous' activity," explained an officer. The co-opting of the chief ministers of troubled states is intended to counter this problem.

In spite of this optimism, however, the new agency's passage will be far from smooth. The first, and the biggest problem, officials say, will be to get the intelligence agencies to bring all they have before the board rather than rushing straight to the prime minister or home minister as in the past. More than anything else the functioning of Indian intelligence agencies has been marred by the element of mutual competition and the new change is meant to do away with this. If it could achieve even part of that it would mean change indeed.

BHOPAL

An Area of Darkness

ON THE face of it, Bhopal looks perfectly normal. Six months after the leak of methyl isocyanate (MIC) from the Union Carbide factory that left more than 2,000 dead and many times that number affected, there is very little left to distinguish it from any other, more normal city: the markets are crowded, the cinema halls are full, the traffic as unruly as ever. Even the worst-hit areas look just as they did before the disaster. But last fortnight a demonstration by gas victims at the site of a film festival held in Bhopal, to protest against needless government expenditure at a time when the Government pleaded lack of funds showed that though Bhopal may seem healed on the outside, the tragedy remains a cause of bitterness for many.

It is the high number of people who visit clinics and hospitals that gives the real situation away. Six months after that awful night of December 2-3, 1984, the official figure of the dead is yet to be finalised and continues to climb. The first list had contained more than 1,400 names but well over a dozen inquest courts had been set up to check the claims of people who said that their family members had been killed. But the lethargic manner of the district administration has assured that the roughly 700 applications that have been received have yet to be totally sorted out. In effect, nearly 200 days after the disaster, the state Government still does not have a precise list of the people who died, let alone of those who have been affected. It may be months before the survey of the affected is entirely complete.

Soon after the tragedy occurred the then chief minister Arjun Singh had said that the answer to the vexed problem of sorting out the injured would be a door-to-door survey to be conducted by the Tata Institute of Social Sciences (TISS), Bombay, assisted by other social work institutes. But it did not quite work out that way. In the first place TISS surveyed just over 25,000 families and was to return a few weeks later for the rest but TISS team leaders were disgusted by what they perceived as the state Government's indifference towards the exercise. They didn't return, and the 11,000 families that have been surveyed since have been mostly looked at by staff of the Census Department. The work is yet to be completed. What is more, the Government has still to complete the processing of the data collected.

The results of the survey are important because interim cash relief can be provided only after this is done. Families of the dead are to receive Rs 10,000 for every member lost but of the 1,762 certified as dead so far—the figure may rest at around 2,000 finally—only 848 of them have received the money. According to government sources, many of the remaining claims are unpaid either because the heirs are not available or because there is difficulty in the identification of the dead. Lethargy is the third, and final, explanation.

Six months after the tragedy of December 1984, the official figure of the dead is yet to be finalised and continues to climb.

Initially the Government had announced ex gratia payment of Rs 2,000 to the seriously affected and Rs 100 to Rs 1,000 to those slightly affected. But the Government has since changed that drastically. It now plans to give Rs 1,500 per affected family—not person, as before—which has a monthly income of less than Rs 500. For a community that has suffered in one way or another for six months running, the sum is grossly inadequate. And how the Government expects people earning just over Rs 500 per month to fend for themselves is also not clear. What is more, though about 18,000 families are expected to ultimately fall under the category prescribed, only about 9,500 have been identified so far and of these, only 4,000 have actually received payment.

Two basic questions have yet to be answered: what is the "affected area"? Who is an "affected person"? The Government has yet to answer these vital questions since it directly affects not only relief but also the questions of distributing compensation when that arises. A Directorate of Claims has now been set up to properly document claims of the injured as well as the claims of establishments, shops, and industries that were hit by the disaster. The state should have realised early that such an organisation would be necessary to deal with so stupendous a task but the directorate's setting up was announced only on April 27, nearly five months afterwards, and even today, the director is yet to be appointed. As time passes it is going to become harder to check the veracity of the claims from some 300,000 persons so far. According to Dr Ishwar Das, additional chief secretary and relief commissioner, a crucial officer who is overseeing all aspects of the tragedy, "Some 800 small-scale manufacturing units and some 18,000 to 20,000 shops and establishments have seen their business hit in the aftermath." There is a lot of money to be made and everyone in Bhopal knows it. Every false claim paid out from compensation received from Union Carbide can only be at the cost of a more deserving person.

The area of rehabilitation is one that continues to be a question mark. Several thousand of Bhopal's inhabitants are in no condition to go back to work due to their continued illness: what is to become of them? There are no easy answers. The Government has chosen to utilise existing schemes, the primary one being 'Step Up' a scheme for self employment. According to official sources, about 4,000 cases have been forwarded to the banks for loans but few people have so far actually received the money. How much active thinking has gone into the framing of these

But if the payment of relief has been slow in getting off the ground the one area in which the people have been considerably benefited is in the supply of foodgrains worth more than Rs 10 crore. Four hundred and seventy tonnes of sugar, [illegible]00 litres of edible oil and 390,000 [illegible] of milk have been provided so far but have now been discontinued. Wheat (27,000 tonnes) and rice (8,100 tonnes), however, will continue to be supplied, according to Chief Minister Motilal Vora, though he refuses to specify for how long.

On another front, the closure of the Carbide plant has raised the issue of what is to happen to its 850 employees. Some officers are in the process of being transferred but the majority are not going to be so lucky. Arjun Singh had announced soon after the disaster that the plant would not be allowed to open, and Vora says he stands by that decision—he goes further to say that "Carbide won't be allowed to operate in Madhya Pradesh ever". This left Carbide no choice but to issue a notice of closure, which it did on April 10. R.K. Yadav, general secretary of the Union Carbide Karamchari Sangh, which claims to represent 450 of the 632 workers, says that neither government nor the management has seriously considered the workers' situation. "Granted that the Government does not want any toxic chemicals here," he says, "but why the use of the existing facilities and infrastructure of Carbide not even being considered? What will happen to us? Refusing to let the plant open in any form is an emotional response; it is no solution." Vora, on the other hand, says that attempts are being made to accommodate Carbide workers in government undertakings but that they unreasonably expect to be adjusted in Bhopal itself. Yadav retorts that so far no single worker has been placed in any government organisation. The union has now gone to the high court challenging the manner of the closure notice.

On the medical side, the greatest controversy has been generated over whether or not to administer sodium thiosulphate, a drug used for detoxification in cases of cyanide poisoning. Did a component of the cyanide pool enter the bloodstream of gas victims? That was the crucial question. In the hours following the disaster, a top Carbide medical expert, Dr B. Avashia, telexed Bhopal suggesting a certain treatment if cyanide posioning was suspected. But on arriving at Bhopal he retraced his steps saying that cyanide had nothing to do with MIC and there was no question of cyanide poisoning.

It is believed now that due to the high temperature and pressure generated due to a reaction in the tank at the time of the leak, and due to the presence of impurities, the MIC broke up into various gases, one of which probably was the lethal hydrogen cyanide (HCN). While it was said that MIC would affect only individual organs, cyanide would be carried in the patients' blood and have long-term repercussions. Administering of sodium thiosulphate would amount to admitting that cyanide in some form had entered the blood. The question being asked in Bhopal is: why was Carbide so keen on denying the cyanide presence? Why was an official circular sent earlier—after the tragedy—to doctors saying that sodium thiosulphate should not be used? Why have government officials consistently denied the presence of cyanide either in the air or blood?

Interestingly, pollution experts of the Central Government had taken air sample in Bhopal on December 5-6 to check if the area was safe. Though it was taken two to three days after the disaster, near the MIC storage tank, the air showed the presence of 4,533 micrograms of cyanide per cubic metre. Fifty metres from the tank, the cyanide reading was 2,533 micrograms per cubic metre. Just outside the plant premises, the reading was nil. This shows that more than 48 hours after the tragedy, a small leak was still taking place and the source was—or was close to—the MIC tank.

Confronted with this information, Ishwar Das said that the state Government had still not been provided any such information from New Delhi! It seems incredible that six months later, the state Government is still to be informed on a matter of such vital importance. From February onwards the Indian Council of Medical Research (ICMR) has been backing the administering of sodium thiosulphate and in effect admitting cyanide presence. The certification came after a study of 180 patients which gave "an indication of amelioration of symptoms in a good proportion of cases. No serious adverse effects have been observed," to quote an ICMR release. Initially, ICMR felt that it was necessary to monitor the thiocyanate level in the urine after injecting the drug but faced with the state Government's argument that it would be difficult logistically to monitor several thousand patients, the ICMR dropped this clause. Doctors who believe in the drug complain that in spite of the ICMR's advice, sodium thiosulphate is still not being administered on the scale that it actually should be.

One of the most appalling aspects of the affair has been the utter lack of medical information forthcoming from Union Carbide, USA. Although Chairman Warren Anderson released a report on what their experts believed actually happened that fateful night, nowhere does the report say anything on the gases that were released in the tank: this, although the company claims to have carried out experiments in which they tried to re-enact conditions in the tank in the course of laboratory experiments. Says Ishwar Das: "Personally speaking, I find it hard to believe that considering their technological advancement, they have not done a lot of work on MIC. They have not provided us any information of the kind that will help doctors with treating the patients."

EVEN as 20 ICMR research projects are underway, several other studies have come up with significant findings:

▶ A fairly large number of people have suffered trauma on account of the disaster. In a polyclinic in the heart of the affected area, a team from the King George Medical College, Lucknow, found 168 mental cases, of whom the bulk suffered from either neurotic depression or anxiety neurosis. A survey of 855 patients in 10 government hospitals, 193 (or 22.6 per cent) were found to be suffering from mental ailments. A majority of the patients were women less than 45 years old.

▶ The news about newborn babies so far has been heartening. According to the ICMR, a survey of 500 babies born since the disaster, does not indicate that foetuses have been affected. However, according to government doctors in Bhopal, the real source of anxiety are the babies yet to come who were less than three months old in their mothers' womb on the night of December 2-3.

▶ Another important study is the one carried out be doctors of the Bombay Municipal Corporation which found that the thiocyanate level in the patients studied was three times higher than the average level found in Bombay: cyanide exists in the blood in the form of thiocyanate. A 100 days after exposure, it found that 79.7 per cent of adults had respiratory symptoms, 65.6 per cent had eye symptoms, 60.3 per cent had gastro-intestinal symptoms, 54.5 had neuro-muscular symptoms, 75.5 per cent had gynaecological symptoms, 67.7 per cent had persisting problems with their vision, and 70.2 per cent had pulmonary function abnormalities. The team had taken a control group eight kilometres from the factory with which the results of the group under observation had to be studied. It was later discovered that the control group had also been affected by the gas leak.

Meanwhile the enquiry commission appointed by the state Government and consisting of Justice N.K. Singh of the Madhya Pradesh High Court is also likely to take longer than was said earlier. Arjun Singh had said that it would submit its report within three months, but laxity on the part of the Government delayed its functioning. In fact, more than once Justice Singh expressed his anger at the way in which the administration chose to behave. The hearing is at the preliminary stage and the recording of evidence will begin only after a month.

A very disturbing aspect of the disaster has been the Government's failure to react urgently. What is more curious is that even people of the non-affected areas of Bhopal have shown a peculiar lack of interest with relation to the travails of the victims. Perhaps it can be explained by the fact that a majority of the population is not originally from Bhopal and therefore maintains a sense of detachment after years of living there. Or perhaps the truth is that the most affected were the poor migrants who have few relationships with the city's other inhabitants. Or perhaps it is the resigned acceptance to violence and death and part of a country wide immunisation to human misery.

GENETICS

Settling Issues

WHEN the study of genetics spawned the saying that maternity was a fact and paternity a belief, the male population quickly lapped it up as a happy truism. They were also often on the safer side of paternity suits. But they may not be much longer if the latest developments in the field of genetics research is any indication. Biochemists at the Forensic Science Department (FSD) of Tamil Nadu have, after intensive and sustained research, finally pitched on a hit of 10 genetic markers to determine the father of a child. Observed the emeritus Professor of Genetis M. Dharmarajan: "We have woken up to this not a day too soon."

Based mainly on properties of blood and saliva and taking into consideration certain physiological factors like the shape of the ear lobes and the hand grips of the alleged father, the mother and the child, the technique is believed to be the most reliable evolved in the country so far. And at Rs 500, the test augurs well for those who have almost always been at the wrong end of the law in the settling of paternity disputes—women and children. In fact, scientific experts and lawyers at a seminar in Madras convened last month by the Forensic Science Society of India, clamoured for a change in paternity law. The impetus for the seminar was provided when two cases were referred to the FSD. In the first, the paternity test proved to an executive, that the child born to his wife was his by noting common genetic markers in the child, the man, and his wife. In the second, now sub judice, a man has complained to a court in Tamil Nadu that his brother is making a false claim that the boy born to his wife was theirs in order to gain access to the property of the farming family. The FSD has sent its findings to court.

Most paternity disputes stem from a stake to inheritance, or due to reasons of status or lineage. Then there are false claims or cases of deliberate or mistaken identity. According to P. Chandrasekharan, director, FSD: "In all such situations, the courts have replied on the evidence of witnesses and on the basis of medical methods based on sterility, duration of pregnancy or physical resemblance. But these are no longer significant."

He points out that a blood test is essential to establish paternity and suggests that it be made mandatory by law. C. Damodaran, the assistant director of FSD and leader of the research team, explains that the test is based on the distinctive quality of these antigens, proteins and enzymes in the blood and the fact that they are inherited. These markers can be detected by starch, gel, electrophoresis and isoelectric focussing techniques used in laboratory analysis.

> The technique is most reliable and augurs well for those who have almost always been at the wrong end of the law in the settling of paternity disputes—women and children.

Although this test does not compare favourably with that employed in advanced countries—where as many as 64 markers have been identified—and although it fails in cases of consanguineous relations and inbreeding, this is the most comprehensive and reliable technique so far evolved in India. As Damodaran says: "Three of the 10 markers we look for are in saliva and this has not been attempted elsewhere. Some markers, depending on the genetic stock and race, are found in some parts of the world. Secretion of saliva is higher here and is therefore one of the specific factors we are looking into for salivary glycoproteins."

But the test does not offer the ultimate answer, as Damodaran himself admits. "We only indicate the likelihood of an alleged father being the real father or his exclusion," he explains. "Confirmation of paternity is more difficult to prove than exclusions unless the state-of-art in parentage testing improves. We present the common inherent factors and the physiological resemblances. Though it may be subjective, it makes it easier to detect the real father." With cytogenetics—the study of chromosomes in the cell—advancing rapidly, it could offer demonstrable evidence of inheritance and therefore real paternity.

But there is as yet no foolproof method. Dharmarajan points out that scientific evidence is not viewed seriously enough by the courts. A child born during the continuance of the marriage or within 280 days of the marriage is assumed to be the offspring of the man and woman concerned and no evidence that the child was born to someone other than the man to whom the mother is married will be allowed.

As Madras lawyer N.T. Vanamamalai observed: "It is quite likely that even if scientific evidence is forthcoming that the putative father was somebody else, the existing law may still stand in the way of proof that he is the father and if it is not proved that the husband could not have had access to the wife." Ironically, the Supreme Court in a decision in 1954 had held that "as the presumption of the legitimacy is highly favoured by law, it is necessary that proof of non-access must be clear and satisfactory". Besides, the existing law is interpreted to mean that scientific evidence is not substantive proof but only expert opinion—that too only in a criminal case.

In a world in which artifical conception and surrogate motherhood are fast catching on, the issue of paternity becomes even more complicated. Still, the new test facilities are a step forward to protect destitute women and their abandoned children. The Madras seminar recommended compulsory paternity testing and new rules to ensure the protection of children. The Government is looking into a proposal for the setting up of a family law commission: a sure indication of greater and more effective awareness.

TERRORISTS

Dangerous Differences

KHALISTANI terrorism in Punjab is potentially more dangerous than the Naxalite insurgency we had in Calcutta and West Bengal in 1969-71 (one deliberately terms it Khalistani terror and not Sikh for the vast majority of this community is patriotic and their culture is not cowardly and terroristic.) The Naxalites borrowed their ideology originally from the Maoist doctrines and the far-eastern kind of insurgency. When, however, they shifted themselves to Calcutta and the industrial suburbs they adopted the organisational structure of the far-west (mainly Brazil and Uruguay). But while borrowing the elitist methods of the Tupamaro and Carlos Marighella they did not change their weaponry, suitable only for mass insurgency. (In communist thinking arms and ideology are often connected; Marshal Tukachevsky was liquidated for recommending and adopting Liddell Hart's concept of tanks and tri-dimensional battle). In Calcutta we usually encountered pipeguns and knives. Sophisticated weapons were a rarity, though we came across a time bomb in Metro cinema in 1970 and a booby trap in Nadia later. In contrast, the Khalistanis have highly sophisticated firearms and infernal devices like transistor bombs, a trend which will manifest itself increasingly in other forms.

On the other hand the Naxalites were stronger in number, they spearheaded the protest movement of a whole generation of students and intellectuals. The Khalistanis have far fewer sympathisers, and are themselves numerically much smaller. Further, they have given the police the additional advantage in that they have gone underground—for the intelligence organisations are much better equipped to penetrate a secret association than to handle a mass upsurge. Further, the gathering of intelligence should be much easier now; earlier we did not have the advantage of computers, various other electronic and sonar devices, and video equipment —which today are available and will be most useful to intelligence men.

There is another major difference between the Khalistanis and the Naxalites. We do not think the Naxalites received much foreign aid. There were a few foreign financial remittances to the Naxalite suspects, and one was from Manila. But so far as the Khalistanis are concerned, they are obviously getting a good deal of help and inspiration from abroad, perhaps even from foreign governments. There is no doubt that foreign intelligence organisations are very powerful in the capital; the recent cases of the enticement of a Soviet diplomat, and the murder of another diplomat suggest that very strongly.

> The centre of Khalistani activism is more likely to be Delhi than Amritsar. The terrorists have to be isolated and put down very quickly. But any over-reaction against the Sikh community will be fatal.

Punjab is a border state, as West Bengal is. But the Naxalites received no material aid from China and very little from the then East Pakistan. Rather, Chou En-lai clearly told Sourin Bose, a Naxalite theoretician, to lay off terror tactics in India (Bose had gone to see Chou through Albania for advice and help); the Chinese statesman reminded Bose how he and Li Li San had their noses bloodied in 1927, trying terrorism in Shanghai. But the Khalistanis undoubtedly receive much aid from our friendly neighbour. Here the style is different. The martial head has the voice of the turtle, while his subordinates use the smuggling routes, organised by the drug traffickers, to send arms, ideas, and perhaps men across the border.

The centre of Khalistani activism is more likely to be Delhi than Amritsar. Here, the task of the police force is clear. The terrorists have to be isolated from the people, and put down very quickly. Time is of essence; and isolation is a must. The police may have to take severe physical punishments, but any over-reaction against the Sikh community will be fatal. And the lack of speed will only help the Khalistanis underground to spread; for some Sikhs who can be faulted for being "macho" (often lauded by some of their own intellectuals) may be attracted by some armed activism.

In Delhi the police have another major problem: they have to keep looking up for advice all the time—and have endless conferences. This will interfere with their vital field work. In West Bengal in 1970-71 we did not have to ask Delhi—ever—as to what we should do, but we sought and received help. The local home department was sensible enough to keep out of our work. Perhaps the rulers in Delhi would see to proper balancing of supervision and allowing initiative. Perhaps they would also have the good sense to keep the army out of it all, determinedly requiring the police to maintain civil order. The army is mainly trained for open war: one of the world's most powerful armies were beaten by the guerrillas in Vietnam.

There is one area however where the army and the Border Security Force can be requisitioned for help to civil power. We need, without any delay whatsoever, expert foreign advice from Belfast, Beirut, or from the police squads which dealt with the Baader-Meinhof gang, to guide our police to anticipate new infernal devices, and take protective and preventive action against such dangers. In handling computers and electronic devices also, the Delhi, Punjab and Uttar Pradesh police may require training in depth. It may not be possible for the civil police to do their daily exacting chores, and also simultaneously train themselves in the new skills in the shortest desirable time. Here, it is worth repeating, army help will be most useful. This may involve, among other things, immediate induction of foreign experts, and organising training courses for the police without delay. The effective aid to the police from the army may range from training police dogs (they sniff out a lot more than one thinks) to training personnel in handling very sensitive electronic devices.

But as Winston Churchill once minuted: "Hurry, hurry, hurry."

RANJIT GUPTA headed the Calcutta Police when Naxalite terrorism was at its worst. He is widely credited with having masterminded the crackdown on the Naxalites movement.

PAINTING

The Shapinsky Story

IS HAROLD Shapinsky really the great unknown genius of a genre of contemporary painting known as Abstract Expressionism? And was he actually retrieved from obscurity in Manhattan last year by an English teacher from Bangalore called Akumal Ramachander? Harold who? Akumal what?

The Shapinsky-Ramachander saga has already hit the headlines in the western media, already been the subject of a film on British television and is now provoking one of the liveliest debates in the world of contemporary art. Author Tariq Ali has compared it to a fairy-tale. Novelist Salman Rushdie thinks it is one of those happy instances in which the East has repaid the West by discovering something the West had mislaid. And art critic Waldemar Januszczak, of the widely-circulated British daily The Guardian has leapt into the fray by downing Ali and Rushdie's claims as "careless, ignorant, hype-ridden, opportunistic, manipulative and just plain silly".

It all started when Akumal Ramachander, now 35, who used to teach English at the University of Agricultural Studies in Bangalore was invited last year to lecture at the Kansas State University in the United States. Arriving in Chicago in September to visit the Indian poet A.K. Ramanujam he happened to meet a young man called David Shapinsky. David, impressed by Akumal's exuberance and apparent knowledge of a vast number of subjects from Polish cinema to Yakshagana, confessed that he had a father who painted in a studio in Manhattan but whose work was unknown. He showed Akumal some slides of his father's work. Akumal was enthused enough to borrow bus fare to New York and visit David's parents. Harold Shapinsky and his wife had lived in shabby gentility for years: Harold quietly painting away and Kate, his wife, supporting him by selling quilts and sweaters. Their apartment was minute and moth-eaten; Shapinsky had been so poor that, unable to afford large canvases, he restricted himself to painting on thick sheets of paper. Undeterred, Akumal was certain this was a genius. He promised Shapinsky a major exhibition in Europe within a year.

The Shapinsky-Ramachander saga has already hit the headlines in the western media, and is now provoking one of the liveliest debates in the world of contemporary art.

At first, he tried peddling slides of the Shapinsky paintings to a variety of Manhattan galleries. There was no response. Then, armed with the 54 slides that he had arranged to be made, he arrived in Europe and began making the rounds in London. As luck would have it, on an afternoon in December last, he managed to show the slides to Ronald Alley, the keeper of the Tate Gallery's modern collection, who remarked: "I was amazed that a real Abstract Expressionist of such quality should be unknown and asked how this could have happened." Alley contacted the Mayor Gallery in London; the Mayor Gallery opened a show on May 21 to coincide with Shapinsky's 60th birthday; authors Rushdie and Ali burst into print heralding a "Major Art Discovery" and "Art Sensation" in the Observer magazine and Time Out respectively; and Channel Four on British television screened an hour-long film which Rushdie narrated and Ali produced called The Painter and the Pest. Last fortnight, the amazing, trail-blazing, magical, fairy-tale-like story of the discovery of a "modern master" was all but consummated. There were some chords of dissent about the actual quality of Shapinsky's works but no one doubted their importance.

Ramachander and Shapinsky: the painter and the pest

Easy on the eye for their vibrant colours and febrile tension of form, Shapinsky's paintings can still tax the mind's eye: in recent weeks both the Illustrated Weekly of India and The Guardian have been rapped on the knuckles for printing Shapinsky's work the wrong side up.

The Mayor Gallery had sold all but three of the 22 works on display at prices ranging between US $ 12,000 and $ 30,000. Shapinsky was said to be moving permanently from his cold apartment in New York to pastoral England. And Akumal Ramachander, the key figure in saga, was enthusiastically celebrating his new found status. An ebullient, short-statured, loquacious man he is given to flighty gesticulation and ceaseless name-dropping ("Angus Wilson thinks very highly of my writing"). Even Rushdie finds him "a bit of an operator". Akumal describes himself as "the pest" or "that crazy Indian from Bangalore" and proudly adds: "People say about me, 'God, this man would gatecrash anywhere'." Equally proudly he relates the story of how he was approached by a 34-year-old English art dealer in a silver Rolls Royce who "wanted to make a deal involving a couple of million pounds" to buy up all existing Shapinskys, sight unseen.

One thing about Akumal is clear: he is unlikely to return to his teaching job in Bangalore and will instead occupy himself making new "discoveries". "I have been discovering people for quite some time," he says. "I discovered the photographer Vaikuttil who took the Shapinsky photographs. He is a genius. Then I discovered a young writer called Samir Dayal, also a genius. People are my personal interest. My discovery of Shapinsky is the biggest art coup of the 20th century. I have since discovered a Dutch sculptor."

Blazing epigrams in chaste Urdu and endless hype about his discovery ("The Americans refuse to acknowledge Shapinsky because they feel snubbed very badly because this man from Bangalore has discovered this great artist.") Akumal is more the indefatigable gadfly buzzing around the art world rather than the erudite or careful scholar immersed in it. In Bangalore he made it a habit of fixing, escorting or introducing any visitor who wanted to be shown around. Jyothi

Meltron. Growing with the nation, for the nation.

The Seventh Five Year Plan envisages a giant leap for India into the forefront of the electronic era. Rising to the challenge, we at Meltron (Maharashtra Electronics Corporation Ltd.) are directing all our activities towards this end. Speeding the Nation into tomorrow — and surging forward ourselves!

Dispersal of units and spillover of technology

We started out in 1978 with the definite objective of promoting a balanced growth of the electronics industry. And we set up each of our units in widely dispersed areas of Maharashtra — Aurangabad, Nashik, Kudal, Nagpur and Bombay. Sometimes we set up plants in backward areas though techno-economic considerations dictated otherwise. Today, we feel that it has all been worthwhile. Take the case of Kudal. When Meltron Instrumentation Ltd. started operations there, Kudal did not have even a semblance of a support industry for electronics.

□ Meltron identified and trained a local utensil manufacturer into a sophisticated instrument cabinet manufacturer!

□ Another small signboard painter was developed into a high quality, specialist painter. And in each case, the training involved the transfer of technology from Meltron's internationally renowned collaborator to the sub-contractor. This advanced know-how was then used by the manufacturer for his other jobs as well.

Yes, at Meltron we plan our growth in keeping with wider national objectives. Today, the nation is on a meteoric growth trail. Fittingly enough, we are going the same way!

Baswan, publisher of a house magazine for Welcom group of hotels, remembers the pains he took when she arrived in Bangalore to prepare a special issue on the city. "I wanted to see a Yakshagana performance and he organised it, I wanted to meet young writers and musicians and he produced them. He was tireless—and tirelessly kind. He said to me as I left, in exquisite Urdu, 'I know I am like a jewel that has not found its jeweller'."

The Bombay-born Akumal was brought up all over India as his father was in the army. He took a Bachelor's degree in science and a Master's in English but, as Rushdie describes him, "he is an amateur in the real sense: a man of many passions... (and it) is impossible not to warm to his openness and affection for life, as well as his obviously genuine love of literature, art, cinema, and many other things, including butterflies." The film on the Shapinsky-Ramachander story has Ramachander saying in the end: "This is a triumph for innocence, that a person like me from Bangalore can break through the western art world and discover a genius." And Tariq Ali sees the event as a sample of the Third World discovering the First, an example of the warped social values of the western art world and the gallery establishment that suppress artists of true genius.

It is probably this kind of instant myth-making that has led some critics to taking a sceptical view of the Shapinsky discovery. While John Russell Taylor in The Times has hailed his work as that of "an extremely good and original abstract expressionist", Waldemar Januszczak of The Guardian in his blistering attack on the hype of the Rushdie-Ali combine which, he claims, is trying to "force" Shapinsky into prominence, calls Shapinsky a minor Abstract Expressionist who has worked diligently in timid isolation to produce "good but not great art".

Shapinsky's work has met with the approval of the European art establishment in general. But in the United States, the country where his art originated but was ignored, there is less acclaim. True, Shapinsky was encouraged by the founding father of Abstract Expressionism, Robert Motherwell, who awarded him a scholarship in his school in 1949 and later selected him for a new talent show in 1951. True also, that he studied with Mark Rothko at the famous "The Subjects of the Artist" school that gave reign to a host of brilliant painters who form the core of the Abstract Expressionist directory. And John Russell Taylor has gone further to suggest that Shapinsky's colours and the extraordinary interior energy of his work are reminiscent of the great American painter Arshile Gorky, properly discovered only after his tragic suicide. But does Shapinsky's work belong, as is being suggested, to the class of such masters of Abstract Expressionism as Wilhem de Kooning and Jackson Pollock? Will, as Salman Rushdie says, the history of Abstract Expressionism have to be rewritten?

Some critics find Shapinsky's work derivative, the portraits resembling Gorky's and the abstracts early or late de Koonings. What is also clear is that Shapinsky is not a first-generation Abstract Expressionist—and Ali and Rushdie may have to slightly hedge their bets. He was born 20 years after Gorky and 13 years after Pollock. In other words, it may be a while before Shapinsky's credentials are properly established. A discovery he is, certainly; how great a discovery is the question.

Such questions, however, are relative as art historians, critics and keen speculators on the art market sharpen their knives and go into battle. As the dissenting critic of The Guardian cynically points out "as the (art) market knows, genuine early de Koonings are now beginning to run out." How many museums and galleries and art establishments in the western market are queuing up or not to show Shapinsky's works is the question. How Shapinsky's prices escalate will determine his greatness. While Shapinsky will happily spend his last years in clover and Akumal will, at 10 per cent on sales, buy himself the "economic freedom" he speaks of, one important factor of the Shapinsky discovery by an Indian is that while the Third World may have discovered the First, in the end, only the First can consume it.

BIHAR

The River of Sorrow

THE KOSI has very aptly been called Bihar's "river of sorrow." Nine months ago, when it breached its eastern embankment in Saharsa district, at least 200 lives were lost, 50,000 acres of crops destroyed and half a million people rendered homeless. The late Mrs Gandhi has suggested stern action against the engineers found guilty of negligence and thereby responsible for the tragedy and G.K. Arora, an official of the prime minister's secretariat had even suggested criminal prosecution of the guilty. But in spite of that it took a lethargic state government until January 14 to begin the breach closure work. On the face of it all went well after that, for the main plugging of the breach was completed 10 days ahead of schedule, on March 17, though much of the secondary work remains to be completed.

But last fortnight, with the monsoon just around the corner, things did not look so rosy. As the Kosi again began rising and eroding its banks the Government was fulfilling the demand of the villagers of the area that they be evacuated. Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey rushed to the area to inspect the work in progress and warned the engineers of grave consequences if the river breached the new embankment again. He also ordered that all the work must be completed by June 20—originally it was to have been completed by May 27. Dubey was far from satisfied with what he saw, and admitted that the people of the area had no confidence in the quality of the work. But there was now no cause for panic, he said as he had "personally supervised everything and this work had been speeded up."

Dubey could do little but put a smiling face on what was actually a pretty grim situation. The chief minister, in the words of the Indian Express, was being "blackmailed" by the Bihar Engineering Services Association (BESA), which had threatened to go on strike if action was taken against some engineers held responsible for the tragedy last year. The BESA has warned that even those engineers working on the breach site would come under the purview of the strike. Thus Dubey's hands were tied; and the strike threat proved so effective that the Government hastily denied any engineer had been suspended. The suspensions had actually been announced earlier. Soft pedalling of the issue began soon after. Said Dubey: "The relief commissioner had held an enquiry and the minister concerned had recommended suspension of certain engineers but I felt the need for a technical committee to pinpoint responsibility and then plan to seek explanations."

But more disquieting still is the fact that the methods employed by the engineers to do the job on hand now do not inspire confidence. The 2.8 km-long breach had been filled up with sand enclosed in nylon bags and a five km-long semi-circular coffer dam has been constructed with eight spurs as a second line of defence. But people working on the site express doubts as to whether it can withstand any serious pressure. Dinesh Jha, an advocate in Saharsa said gloomily: "If the bund is breached this time everything will be washed away and then nobody would survive to narrate what happened."

Circle Superintending Engineer T. Nath, however, claims that he has performed an "engineering feat" by closing the breach much ahead of the deadline. And engineers at the site contend there is nothing wrong with the methods employed. The flatter hydraulic gradient was recommended by the high-level Kosi Technical Committee and was tested at the Pune Research Institute. Nath says the Kosi is known for the heavy sand content in its water and "our efforts to introduce boulders and other material have failed as the river did not accept this." He says that by adopting sand-based methods the engineers had saved Rs 40 lakh. His real success, says Nath, was not in constructing the coffer dam and filling the breach but in pushing the Kosi back 1.5 km to its original position, as it has changed its course after the breach.

Engineers, however, say that Rs 8 crore was sanctioned for the entire work: closure of the breach, construction of the coffer dam and strengthening of the entire embankment. But the Dubey Government, despite its lofty claims to efficiency, released the funds only on May 12. Official sources in Patna agree that funds are released only after much bureaucratic delay. Funds were also delayed for the Ekra site, which was another danger point. Other claims of the BESA blaming the state Government include the allegations that the Kosi Committee, which inspects the river's course and makes recommendations for flood control protection, had not mentioned the breach site in its recommendation of December 1983. The Committee says the BESA had suggested that Rs 6 crore be granted for flood control measures, but the Government sanctioned only Rs 2 crore. Thus it was not possible to protect many vulnerable points.

Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey went to inspect the work in progress and warned the engineers of grave consequences if the river breached the new embankment again.

A flooded village: doubtful methods?

K.M. KISHAN

Meanwhile many of those most affected, the villagers whose land was washed away or buried under a heap of sand, are living a hand to mouth existence. Says P. Singh of Gorpara village who owned 25 bighas of land and a pucca house but is now landless: "Our village went under water when the Kosi rose, now it is buried under a heap of sand which is called the new protective bund." Thousands of others sit hungry and jobless in relief tents. Says Achmit Mullah: "Till last year I was a farmer owning land and orchards. Now I am a pauper and my family of 10 is starving. I don't know if any government or administration exists."

According to official sources, about 500 villages were inundated of, which 20 were washed away and five completely, wiped out. But the administration stopped distribution of free rations after March 31 and has now started distributing Rs 74 per head for house construction. Officials agreed that this was almost meaningless, but Dubey said in Patna that the state Government would distribute seeds and fertilisers at a 75 per cent subsidy. People in Saharsa find this a laughable state of affairs. They point out that unless efforts are made to reclaim the fields nothing will grow on the land for years. Taking all these aspects into account it seems that the travails of those who live by the Kosi are far from ended. —FARZAND AHMED

25 YEARS OF ENGINEERING EXPERTISE IN INDIA'S CORE INDUSTRIES NOW COMES TO YOU IN ONE COMPLETE KIT

25 years ago a team of 16 workmen led by a man of dynamic enterprise set up a small Cast Iron Foundry in the industrial township of Bhilai. That was the beginning of Bhilai Engineering Corporation Limited (BEC), one of the earliest engineering ancillaries of the Bhilai Steel Plant

Today, BEC is a technologically advanced Integrated Engineering Complex, providing vital inputs and services to a number of major industries in the country's core sector — Steel, Mines, Cement, Power, Heavy Industries and the Railways ... to name a few. BEC has also made a mark in the international market through exports of Steel Plant Equipment to Egypt, Bangladesh and the USSR.

A proven track record of engineering expertise in India's core industries

Baptised in the Steel Industry, BEC has pioneered the indigenous manufacture of items like Coke Oven Castings, Ingot Moulds, Sinter Cars, etc. (in the Private Sector). Outside the Public Sector, BEC has manufactured the largest quantities of Ingot Moulds, Heat Resistant Coke Oven Castings, Sinter Cars and Rolling Mill Roller Table Frames for the Integrated Steel Plants. BEC is one of the select few to manufacture such critical inputs for the Railways as Casnub Bogies, Couplers, Axle Boxes, Traction Motor Magnet Frames, etc.

Two and a half decades ago, BEC's equipment started replacing Russian equipment in the Steel Plants in India. Today, such equipment are being exported to the USSR under stringent quality control and time-bound programmes.

The Pursuit of Perfection

In its pursuit of perfection, BEC has built up an infrastructure for excellence:

- A dedicated team of 1300 top-class professionals — engineers, technicians, workmen and other vital personnel
- Modern facilities for Steel Castings (upto 15T piece weight); Alloy Steel Castings; Grey Iron and Alloy Iron Castings (upto 30T piece weight); fabrication of equipment and vessels (upto 50T piece weight); machining and assembly. All in the same premises
- Stringent quality control measures and testing facilities
- First-hand experience in major projects, working closely with technical experts from India and abroad
- Design and engineering expertise for metallurgical and mineral processing equipment, materials handling projects, environmental engineering and a host of other industries.

It is all this that has created an environment of excellence at BEC. For 25 years. Excellence that is now yours to avail in one complete kit.

The Growth Debate

INDUSTRIAL GROWTH IN INDIA: Stagnation since the Mid-Sixties
By ISHER JUDGE AHLUWALIA
Oxford University Press
Price: Rs 120; Pages: 235

THE POLITICAL ECONOMY OF DEVELOPMENT IN INDIA
By PRANAB BARDHAN
Oxford University Press
Price: Rs 60; Pages: 118

IS THE Indian economy speeding up or slowing down? The answer, if one turns to economists, is predictably unhelpful, with some arguing the first and others the second. Isher Judge Ahluwalia presents a mass of evidence in her well-argued book to justify its title, and Pranab Bardhan takes off from here to look at the reasons for the economy's unconvincing performance. Yet there are others who argue quite the opposite from Ahluwalia: K.N. Raj, for instance, has disagreed with her conclusions in an article published by The Economic and Political Weekly, and Yogendra Alagh in a recent Govind Ballabh Pant lecture has contended that the growth performance has, if anything, been improving.

There have, in the process, been disputes over the statistics which were used to measure economic performance, and over the periods studied (Ahluwalia argues, for instance, that growth has slowed down since the mid-'60s, but Alagh says growth has picked up since the mid-'70s).

Nevertheless, the debate has been instructive. Ahluwalia shows, for instance, that some of the common arguments put forward as explanations for the industrial slowdown since the mid-'60s have no validity. Using well-organised sets of statistics, she shows that the slowdown has nothing to do with rising poverty or a worsening pattern of income distribution. Similarly, the slowdown is not because of a wage goods constraint, for if this were the case the sectors to be affected would have been the employment-intensive ones. Instead, the real slowdown in the last two decades has been in the capital-intensive heavy industry sector. Finally, she dismisses the argument that the slackening of the import substitution drive since the mid-'60s caused industry to slow down: import substitution has continued after that in heavy industry, which has grown slowly, while consumer durables have grown rather rapidly despite the absence of a similar import substitution drive.

If these are not the reasons, what is the real answer? Ahluwalia offers not one but many. To start with, she says, there has been a slowdown in public investment in key infrastructural sectors, leading to severe supply-side bottlenecks that have been compounded by the poor management of the infrastructure. Apart from these, the continued slow growth of agricultural incomes has meant that demand for goods has increased slowly. Finally, the framework of industrial policy has led to more regulation than promotion, avoidable delays in investment decisions, the absence of foreign competition and the curbing of domestic competition, the use of dated technologies, and the absence of any incentive to reduce costs, leading to a high-cost industrial superstructure.

Ahluwalia also argues that there has been an overall decline in the growth of productivity. She notes the steady increases in the capital-output ratios over time, and goes on to demolish the usual argument put forward as the explanation, which is that this results from the capital-intensive nature of the pattern of investment. Instead, she shows that there is evidence of growing inefficiencies in the use of the factors of production.

Ahluwalia's case is well argued, and it is difficult to fault her conclusions concerning the reasons for the industrial slowdown since the mid-'60s. But the fact remains that if the period from the mid-'60s to the mid-'80s is further broken up into two phases, before and after 1976, the statistics suggest that the picture could be different from the one drawn by Ahluwalia. But since she does not take note of this, she has no explanations to offer either.

Bardhan's readable offering is based on his Radhakrishnan Memorial Lectures, delivered at All Souls College, Oxford, and attempts something quite different from Ahluwalia. He focuses essentially on aspects of India's political economy in his search for the reasons for India's slow economic growth.

Sharing common ground with Ahluwalia in spotting the role played by insufficient public investment in the agricultural and industrial infrastructure, and of "public management of capital", Bardhan goes on to an illuminating discussion of the economic classes that dominate the Indian state.

He outlines three "proprietory classes" in Indian society: the industrial capitalist class, the rich farmers and the professionals. In one way or other, all three have tried to garner advantages for themselves. The first used the Government's import substitution and trade restriction policies to advantage while flouting other policies that went against their interests (e.g. licensing curbs), the farmers have got away with virtually no significant taxation of their incomes and wealth, while enjoying subsidies on power and irrigation, and the professionals have managed to direct educational investment away from the masses and thus "been able to protect their scarcity rent" while acquiring licence-giving powers in the bureaucracy.

There are, of course, conflicts between these classes, and it is Bardhan's thesis that, with none of the three dominant classes able to reign supreme, there is a loose and uneasy coalition, with each pulling in different directions. The result: a proliferation of subsidies to satisfy each class, and the consequent eating up of government revenue through the privatisation of public resources, leaving little behind for public capital formation. The final result of the plurality of proprietory classes is the 'soft state', and the absence of 'political will' for hard decisions. As a spillover, the "competitive politics of democracy" keeps the rival partners in the coalition on the defensive.

While this is certainly not a complete explanation it does point to a fundamental truth about the Indian system. In a different context, Ahluwalia has helped clarify the issues in the growth debate. Both offerings are valuable aids to understanding India's economic reality.

◆ The Malayalam film world has recruited a new girl that should send its plethora of Tamil, Telugu and Punjabi sex bombs into a slow sizzle. Producers, fed up with those pounds of flesh, have discovered 19-year-old Sunanda Nair, who is everything that their present heroines are not—fresh, traditional, homely. After a long time, a conventional Malayali Nair girl—she's also a chartered accountancy student—has put a gingerly foot into the forbidden world of films. But now that she's there, nothing's going to stop Sunanda. She was reportedly paid the highest signing amount in south India for her maiden film Manichepu Thuranappol. "I tell you my daughter is a multi-faceted personality," beamed papa P.K.R. Nair, the controversial former director of ports. The offers are pouring in, but as Sunanda said: "No sex please, we are traditional." In other words: so Nair and yet so far.

SUNIL GURUVAYOOR

◆ Once is obviously not enough for Shabana Azmi. For the third time in a row she picked up the National Award for the best actress of the year (for Paar in 1985) at a function held in New Delhi recently. One would think Shabana would have got used to awards by now. But no, she was in Assam when she heard the good news and stubbornly refused to believe it. It was only when she landed at Bombay airport and saw two dozen friends holding up placards that said, "Oh no, not again," that the actress par excellence let out a long sigh of relief. "It was too much," she gushed, "who could have thought?" Since then, it's been champagne, roses and partying all night long. Next year, the talented actress will get the chance to prove herself in another field—she plans to script and direct a film, "but I don't want to talk about it now or people will get sick hearing about it."

◆ There was no leisurely breakfast in bed for the new bride. The morning after he got married, 24-year-old tennis star Ramesh Krishnan flew off to England to play the Beckenham tennis tournament leaving his one-day-old bride Priya Seshasayee to catch up with him a few days later. "I hope marriage will bring me luck to win the Wimbledon," Ramesh was overheard saying soon after the wedding last fortnight. Priya has just completed her B.A. in English from the Stella Maris College, Madras, but it looks like she'll have to switch her major to tennis. After Beckenham husband Ramesh will play the Queen's Club and then Wimbledon and then the Davis Cup. The honeymoon may be over, but the courtship, it seems, will continue for a long, long time.

◆ When Judith de Paul announced a film on Indira Gandhi, starry aspirants across the world—including Anne Bancroft—raised their antennae. But a decade of doing "what's the good word?" for Doordarshan seems to have taught aspirant Sabira Merchant a trick or two. "I think I stand a very slim chance," said the high priestess of Bombay society while making all the right moves. She typed out her resume, picked out her best photographs for the casting director. And then Sabira went a daring step further—she streaked for the role. With the help of a professional make-up man, Sabira got her hair streaked white and husband Chhotu made a little video recording of the reincarnation—which has now been sent off to Rajiv Gandhi so that when Director de Paul discusses the script and cast with the royal family next month, she may get a... ah, the good word is "recommendation".

FOCUS THIS FORTNIGHT

New Money Spinner

With shares enjoying an unprecedented boom, new share issues evoking record responses from the public and the number of investors trebling in the last five years to 7 million, the stock market has now become the middle class Indian's financial El Dorado.

COVER STORY 78

Unravelling the Clues

Was it or was it not a bomb which caused the Air-India crash last month? The recovery of the black box has raised hopes of solving the mystery. Meanwhile Air-India is grappling with the problem of security that has acquired a new and worrying dimension.

CURRENT EVENTS 18

The Agony of Kalahandi

For 20 long years, there has been drought and famine in Kalahandi, a district of Orissa. Last month, when women began to abandon and sell their children out of desperation, the country was forced to sit up and notice how cruel both nature and the Government have been.

SPECIAL FEATURE 52

An Uncertain Legacy

Madhavsinh Solanki has finally bowed out as Gujarat chief minister but his successor, Amarsinh Chaudhuri, is hardly an inspiring choice. Whether he can curb the violence is to be seen. A report on the riot victims and an interview with the new chief minister.

SPECIAL REPORT 60

Gunfire on the Glacier

For over a year Indian and Pakistani troops have been waging a protracted war over the desolate Siachen glacier area in Kashmir. As fresh clashes occurred last fortnight there were signs that both armies were digging in for more action.

DEFENCE 132

Reviving the Battle

India's controversial family planning programme of the 1970s is getting a new look and shifting into high gear. From being a low-key, faceless issue, it is fast becoming priority number one under Rajiv Gandhi and several new strategies are being adopted.

TRUE PICTURE

The cover story "Destination Disaster" (July 15) has presented a very true picture of the crash of flight 182 which has shocked people all over the world. Every civilised person will condemn the killing of innocent people. Two men had alighted midway, a practice which should be curbed immediately by the airlines all over the world, this would help in controlling the extremist activities of the terrorists. They are making selected airlines their targets in order to blackmail the respective governments for their own gain. Strong measures should be adopted for tightening security at all airports.

Jaipur — V. BALA KRISHAN

■ The acts of a few fanatical saboteurs should not be allowed to hinder the process of reconciliation in Punjab. The governments of Canada, the US and the UK should realise that pampering the Sikhs would be politically and diplomatically counter-productive.

Baroda — AMIT R. DHOLAKIA

■ Your cover story mentions the mercenary school in the US but one fails to understand why such a school has been allowed to run. As long as terrorists wanted by a country are welcomed, supported and trained by other countries, the fight against terrorism will prove futile.

Delhi — K.S. ROOPRAI

IMAGE BOOST

Your special feature on Indo-US relations (July 15) was vivid, informative and excellently reported. The photographs as well were superb. Judging by all accounts Rajiv Gandhi's visit to the US has been a tremendous success and has boosted India's image. This visit will definitely open a new chapter in Indo-US ties.

Calcutta — RAJVIR GREWAL

BACKING OUT?

Your article "Solanki Under a Cloud" (July 15) was timely. There is no doubt that the state Government has turned out to be incapable of handling the anti-reservation stir, now a caste war. While the continued reprisal of a particular segment of the society is not warranted, the politicians are, however, not beyond criticism for this chaos, because they have certain electoral promises to fulfil, and they cannot back out overnight.

Delhi — RAJIV HANDA

THE HUMANE FACTOR

Your cover story on Dhirubhai Ambani ("The Super Tycoon", June 30) made interesting reading. Your assessment and analysis of his style of management are excellent. But one aspect of the success of Dhirubhai has not been focused in proper perspective in your article, that is his down-to-earth human quality, which no other 'moghul' of the Indian industry possesses. Dhirubhai may have commercial skill, technical understanding, financial wizardry, managing the Government (or the environment as our current management jargon says), marketing innovations etc. But far above all these qualities is Dhirubhai's understanding of the common people which has helped him achieve his goal.

Bombay — SHALIL GHOSH

■ The media is mainly responsible for projecting Dhirubhai Ambani as the "super tycoon". Certain reports do show a tinge of jealousy, but Dhirubhai has done nothing wrong. As an enterprising businessman he has made his way to the top by virtue of his tactfulness, shrewdness and tremendous foresight.

Cuttack — ARTA MISHRA

IDENTITY CRISIS

Your report "Sikh Youth: Wounded Psyche" (June 30) investigates the circumstances in general, responsible for conversion of an ordinary man into a terrorist. Moreover, it also reveals the fact that how the police forces are harassing the innocent and non-violent Sikhs while the real terrorists are still out of custody. The article indicates that it is the frustration that converts one into a terrorist. To get rid of the frustration a young man can do anything, destructive or constructive. The economic conditions of the unemployed are also responsible for the turning point of their lives. But sadly these factors

DIVYANSHU RAJAN
Darbhanga, Bihar

■ The article on the Sikh youth was really upsetting, but why don't the Sikhs understand that the purpose of the Operation Bluestar was merely against the anti-national Sikhs. The others still command the same respect as they did before the so-called alienation of the Sikhs.

SURESH THAKUR
Indore

■ The confessions of Virsa Singh Valtoha reveal the plot used by Sikh terrorists to lure innocent, young Sikhs to become militants by exploiting their religious sentiments and converting them into fanatics. The various incidents of murder, robbery and terrorism indicate the sinister designs of the terrorists to create disorder and drive the Government up the wall. When these activities took place before the Operation Bluestar, the Sikh intellectuals kept silent. Now we see a change in their outlook and many of them openly dissociate themselves from these terrorists. This feeling should make every young Sikh like Virsa Singh realise that terrorism is not the means and end to solve the Punjab problem. If only the Sikh high priests denounce the terrorism and excommunicate such individuals from the panth, it will pave the way for a healthy climate for solving the Punjab tangle.

GILBERT D'SOUZA
Vaiparai

■ Frustration seems to be taking the younger generation of Sikhs to a path of terrorism. There seem to be two distinct reasons that have pushed them over the brink. Firstly the Government's Fabian policy towards the Punjab issue, and secondly the arrogant behaviour of the police who are the so-called law-keepers. The police should definitely be made to understand that it is a handful of extremists that they have to fight and not the entire Sikh community.

C. SURYAM
Eluru, Andhra Pradesh

■ What does a kid like Gurbhej Singh know about religion that he speaks of protecting it. It only speaks of the one thought that lies in the minds of the Sikhs: Khalistan. They are upset by the Operation Bluestar but why don't they ask themselves the simple question: why did it ever happen? They themselves are to blame. In spite of repeated warnings by the army, Bhindranwale and his men refused to surrender.

In order to tackle such terrorism the Government should undertake more vigorous anti-terrorism drives. The Government would be naive to think that subsidies and concessions would help solve the Punjab crisis.

By giving Gurbhej Singh and others like him so much coverage in your magazine, you are bestowing a certain amount of respectability and transforming them into mini celebrities.

SANDEEP KUMAR
Ranchi

■ The opinion of some Sikhs that they are not treated as equals and they feel more alienated is a fallacy, considering the fact that some of the highest posts in our country are held by them.

Swaran Singh's query of whether India likes to have Sikhs staying in the country or not is absurd. The Government's acceptance of the major Akali demands and the Hindu community's rescue operations during the riots and also the absence of the Hindu backlash after the transistor bomb attacks by the terrorists are clear indications of Hindu-Sikh amity.

It is time the Akalis sort out their own differences and resumed talks with the Central Government and settle the issue amicably.

MANJULA KUMAR
Pune

BACHCHAN'S BLUNDER

The article "Amitabh Bachchan: Playing a Double Role" (June 30) was a candid and a truthful picture of the actor. It was one of the greatest blunders on the part of the actor to give up his flourishing career as a super star to make a profession in politics. In fact by doing so, he has done great injustice to his fans. He should have been able to judge for himself whether he was capable of fulfilling the duties of an MP or not. Instead of raising a new controversy now with his irresponsible statement in a press interview, it would be better for him to return to films where not only would many producers be waiting for him but also a lot of fans looking forward to see him on screen once again.

J.R. LAROIYA
NOIDA, Uttar Pradesh

■ It does seem that Amitabh Bachchan was a reluctant entrant into politics, whose prime function was to defeat a formidable opponent in the Lok Sabha elections. That he did, and very successfully, but beyond that one should not have expected anything very much from him. After all he is not Rajiv Gandhi to have taken to politics like a duckling to water. Amitabh should resign if he feels that politics is not his cup of tea.

BLEAK HOUSE

On one side we have women like Maya ("House of Horror", June 30) who even after losing everything have the courage and hope to fight back. On the other side are the social workers like Swaroop Bakshi who can do something to help the needy women but are indifferent to the situation and refuse to accept the pitiable and unhygienic conditions prevailing in the protection homes. The callous and contemptuous attitude of such workers provide passive encouragement to the elements which harass the inmates of these homes. Such workers should be shunned by the society.

RAVI SANDHU

FESTIVAL FURORE

In the letters to the editor (June 30) the criticism rendered to the festivals being held in France and Washington is not justified. Furthermore, there is nothing inappropriate in their timing. On the contrary, the time is just right. Owing to various factors, both natural and unnatural, India has been in the limelight in recent times. People abroad are looking at it with interest and curiosity. The festivals only accentuate this interest and thus serve their purpose, and fairly well.

A vast country like India is always beset with some problem or the other. If one reschedules the festivals because of this, in all likelihood, they shall never be held. Moreover, the prime minister's visit abroad at a time when trouble was brewing within, was not to inaugurate the festivals but to improve bilateral relations. And it seemed right to coincide the opening with his visit. The festivals hope to increase trade, tourism and foreign investment in our country. Their effect should be considerable if the initial success is any indication. It is something we should wait and see instead of viewing the entire venture in a negative light.

SAMIR KHUSHALANI
New Delhi

■ That from all of America's riches, you should choose blue jeans over Adams, Bernstein, Graham etc prefer hamburgers to jambalaya, hoola hoops to basketball, blue suede shoes to beaded moccasins, bubble gum to baked beans, Donald Duck to Willie Loman....is a reflection on your society, not ours.

Whatever happened to Behram Uncle and a few important tips on how to use a flash.

Poor Behram Uncle. There he was, all ready for a shot with his grandchildren and the photographer did him in. If only the chap was a little closer, the light from his flash would've got Uncle Behram into the picture.

Actually, using a flash is easy, but the trick is in controlling it to get a good image. Here are a few tips on how to make your flash your camera's best friend.

India Photographic Company Limited — a Kodak affiliate

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Understanding your flash

Your flashgun is your greatest asset when 'existing light' is too low – it provides your camera with almost the same light as daylight. Another advantage is that you can also use the flash in daylight to restore detail and pleasing colour rendition in backlit portraits or to achieve a better exposure when your subject is in the shade. A flash can also 'freeze' motion — good when you're shooting frisky kids. Knowing your flashgun and its abilities (whether it's a built-in flash or a separate equipment) could be one of the best things that happened to your photography.

Flash points

If you have a built-in flash, take care that the flash window is above the lens, not below. Ignore this rule and you end up with 'monstrous' pictures — shadows thrown upwards.

Give your flash enough time to recharge (a little indicator will tell you when it's ready) and it will give the same intensity of light as before. Always remember to carry fresh batteries.

Since the actual light thrown on the subject is impossible to gauge, the exposure has to be calculated on the basis of guide numbers.

Take care your fingers or the flap of your camera case remains clear of the flash window; if they block it, underexposure will result.

Some points to remember

If you're using a flash against a white wall or a reflective surface, look out for glare. If you can't change camera angle, put a handkerchief or facial tissue over the flash to cut down on glare. Remember to adjust your speed to the recommended number. (1/60 of a second is a safe bet — to avoid partly blackened exposures — generally experienced at higher speeds when flash-synchronization goes haywire).

If by chance you use a long exposure or leave the camera on auto and the auto has decided the situation needs a long exposure, you will get one of two effects. The first is an overexposed image, the second an interesting blurred picture plus a sharp image from the flash — a fascinating effect.

A built-in flash seldom can light subjects beyond 20 feet (6m). See the flash or camera instruction manual to find the distance range of your unit.

Kodak – an internationally renowned name in photographic excellence.

Kodak and professionals agree that a camera is as good as the film in it. Which is why we put so much effort into providing photographers with the finest range of films, processing chemicals and papers. Products responsive to any situation, able to capture the textures, richness or subtlety of mood.

Even more important, Kodak products are reliable and consistent in their quality. Year after year. Batch after batch.

If you're serious about your photography, keep company with the people who are as serious about it as you are. Kodak.

The Media Message

SINGAPORE'S Prime Minister, Lee Kwan Yew, once said that there were only two professions in the world for which no training seemed to be required: politics and journalism. So it is perhaps only natural that practitioners of the two, who come in all shapes, sizes and qualities, should share a very marked degree of sensitivity of what one says about the other. This much was in evidence last fortnight at Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's first press conference in India when what ought to have been considered discussion concerning the shortcomings of the two professions seemed suddenly to take on confrontationist overtones to do with basic freedoms and responsibilities.

Just a month ago, talking to the National Press Club in Washington, the prime minister declared with pride that the press in India is free, and then appended an unguarded remark that "sometimes I think it is worse than yours." The Americans laughed it away for the joke wasn't on them. But at last fortnight's press conference Rajiv persisted. In answer to a question about allowing the government-controlled media autonomy he declared: "I do not think you have behaved responsibly at all. The way you people write and publish...if radio and TV behaved like the press there will be tremendous danger to democracy."

If he was being serious—and there is no reason to suppose that he wasn't—it was a sweeping, unfair indictment of the press betraying an unexpected distrust of the media. After all, the print media has never before been so approving of the policies and actions of a head of government as it has been with Rajiv these past few months. Praise and approval have been lavish; criticism, where it has been delivered, has been guarded. And yet the media is accused of irresponsibility!

There is, of course, no need to pretend that all journalists are hard-nosed professionals or that all newspapers and magazines committed to the integrity of the profession. Far from it. Like other countries with a free press, India too has its share of scandal sheets and yellow journalism, of planted stories and slander and libel. But then, as all countries who don't have a free press know, that is not such a high price to pay for the advantages of press freedom. Jawaharlal Nehru recognised this when he said: "I would rather have a free press with all its drawbacks then one shackled and unworthy of performing its basic role."

To be fair, the prime minister did go on to affirm that he was totally against government interference in the functioning of the press and that it was up to the press to police itself. While this is unexceptionable at first sight, it doesn't suggest the whole answer. Professional bodies should be charged with setting ethical and professional standards so that there is less and less irresponsible writing and publication, but it is ultimately the proper application of laws that will protect the interests of individuals—including politicians—and prevent slander and misrepresentation.

If the exchange at the press conference was merely a question of divergent perceptions on the Indian press, it could be left at that. Politicians and newsmen traditionally don't see eye to eye on so many issues; the role and responsibility of the media is just one. But the remarks were made in a particular context, that of allowing radio and television autonomy. And here, once again, basic issues are involved. Radio and television reach far, far more people than the print media can ever hope to, and in them the Government has an unsurpassable vehicle for its views and for propagating much needed social and cultural values. That said, however, it is necessary to recognise that autonomy does not amount to inviting the kind of irresponsible journalism that the prime minister seemed to have in mind at his press conference.

There are two issues here. One is the obvious need to make All India Radio and Doordarshan do their job better. This means more professionalism, better staff, an open system in which outsiders can contribute. It means liberalisation, more money, better equipment. It means commitment, effort and protection against interfering politicians and vested interests. All of this, in a word, spells greater autonomy.

The other issue is more vital because it has to do with credibility. The recent past is littered with the failure of official media to carry conviction—whether it had to do with the family planning programmes in the Emergency or the announcement of Mrs Gandhi's death, Operation Bluestar or the Gujarat agitation. The content of official domestic news programmes is laughable when it doesn't have to be. There seems to be some impression that credibility is simply criticism of the Government. It is not; it means projecting the facts, allowing debate and letting the cross currents of opinion flow on the air waves. Of late, there has been a perceptible improvement on Doordarshan, in the more liberal discussions such as on the Punjab problem and on Janavani, a programme in which citizens interrogate cabinet ministers. But these are only the beginnings and a long way remains to be travelled. And if the journey is not performed at a good clip, it is ultimately the Government that will suffer because just as the average Indian isn't willing to be taken for granted when it comes to elections, the average citizen is waking up to the information and communications revolutions and will demand to know, speedily, accurately and in the fullest detail.

Meltron. Growing with the nation, for the nation.

The Seventh Five Year Plan envisages a giant leap for India into the forefront of the electronic era. Rising to the challenge, we at Meltron (Maharashtra Electronics Corporation Ltd.) are directing all our activities towards this end. Speeding the Nation into tomorrow — and surging forward ourselves!

A marketing push

Our Central Marketing Division markets the products of diverse small and medium scale electronics units, besides our own products. Because we believe that entrepreneurs venturing into the sophisticated area of electronics need to concentrate all their energies on manufacturing.

□ Take the case of a company making automatic traffic signalling systems. After Meltron took over its marketing operations, its turnover increased almost 10 fold!

□ Another entrepreneur had developed a versatile small computer. But it was Meltron who launched the product successfully in a highly competitive market.

Today Meltron markets the products of about 10 such associate units.

Blue Star's major new thrust in Hi-Tech Electronics includes a manufacturing collaboration with Jeumont-Schneider....

.... the world leader in Telecommunications and Office Automation Technologies.

Backward Integration into Manufacture

For over 30 years we at Blue Star have been in the forefront of marketing Telecommunications Equipment, Computer Systems, Test & Measuring Instruments, Process Control Instrumentation, Analytical Instruments. Medical Electronics.

We have now entered an aggressive, new phase. Backward integration into the manufacture of:

- Telecommunication Equipment (EPABX Systems)
- Mini Computers, Desk Top Systems and Peripherals
- Process Control Instrumentation
- Analytical Instruments
- Computer Software for export.

Our collaboration with Jeumont-Schneider for the manufacture of Electronic PABX equipment is a vital component of our major new thrust in Electronics. And will help propel our turnover in electronics to over Rs. 150 crores in the next three years.

In the process it will enable us to usher in a revolutionary era of unified office communications. With Electronic PABX systems which will transform the present nightmare of the telephone into a modern dream world of error-free efficiency and convenience. And provide an automated link and dialogue between the telephone, electronic mail equipment, office machines and the computers within your office.

A revolution in communications not believed possible in our country until today!

In the vanguard: with State-of-the-art Solutions!

Telecommunications, Defence and Space. Banking, Industry and Government. Medicine, Research and Education.

Increasingly, they will need Telecommunication, Computer and Instrumentation Systems.
That's where they will find Blue Star Electronics.
Up front. With total, state-of-the-art solutions to their complex problems.

The supremacy in modern technology of Maruti-Suzuki is indisputable. To maintain their technology lead, they will go to any length to get the right component to make the perfect product.

So now, when Suzuki are collaborating with Maruti, it cannot be just any battery for their car. It has to be specially designed to meet exacting performance standards in relation to weight, be failsafe, provide optimum starting performance and last the longest.

Exide is the only battery that comes through with flying colours. With their technical expertise backed by their experience of Indian conditions, Chloride, makers of Exide, have developed a special battery that not only matches exacting international standards, but also stands up to the tough operating conditions in India.

With the Maruti-Suzuki on the roads for over a year, Exide has justified the faith placed in it.

Soon others will follow suit. Such as DCM-Toyota, Swaraj-Mazda and Mahindra Peugeot, to name just a few. In every case they have specified Exide.

Ask them about Exide. They will tell you that Exide batteries are the best.

Mount Fujiyama, the highest peak in Japan, towers above all – a symbol of supremacy.

Exide. The best you can buy.

"The geometry factor in art, introduced by early Egyptian architects and artisans, has had a lasting impact on aesthetic concepts of today.

In fashion, the elements of geometry come as a liberating relief from the dominance of floral patterns. The geometric line becomes the fashionable stripe, the point and circle, a dot, the square, a check. Add to these the cube, zig-zag, diamond and arc and we have a panoply of shapes, simple yet permanent. Since these shapes are fundamental, they allow ground colours to have full play.

"Geometric" is the new story line for Garden-Vareli fabrics — trendy, futuristic...in keeping with the image of the modern woman as a liberated one."

Vijai SUPER mark II

There's no 150 cc scooter to match it for ECONOMY POWER SAFETY.

FEATURES	Brand X	Brand Y	Vijai Super Mark-II
FUEL ECONOMY Kms/litres	40 ± 6	40	56 ± 6
POWER BHP	6.3	6.5	9.6
SAFETY Engine Mounting	Right hand side	Central	Centrally aligned

Vijai Super Mark-II. The latest mo from Scooters India Limited — successors to Innocenti of Italy. The winner at the Indian Grand P at Barrackpore and Sholavaram, it now incorporates a number of innovations for even greater economy, power, safety and durability.

SUPER ECONOMY: 56 ± 6 kms/lit The new variable venturi carburet based on Japanese technology provides the engine just the right amount of fuel at different speeds SAVING FUEL.

Improved cylinder design avoids turbulence and reversal of gas flow resulting in complete combustion gas.

Modified gear ratio reduces transmission loss, giving greater fu economy even at lower speeds.

SUPER POWER: 9.6 BHP
Vijai Super Mark-II is the most powerful scooter on the road, going from 0 to 60 kms in 12.75 seconds flat.

When the traffic light turns green, it is the first to take off.

SUPER SAFETY
The centrally mounted engine, low centre of gravity and wider wheel base offer greater stability while turning and braking — even at high speeds with load.

Its 35 watt rectangular headlamp provides a powerful wide beam making night riding safer.

SUPER DURABILITY
Modified material composition of cylinder, chrome plated piston rings and the use of solid lubricant significantly increases engine life.

With the new washable fibre filter based on American technology, the engine breathes freer and cleaner. That's why it carries a warranty of 1 months or 10,000 kms (whichever is earlier) — the longest on any two wheeler.

Vijay Super Mark-II is totally dependable, because it undergoes 1000 tough quality checks and is so and serviced through 225 outlets countrywide.

Made to exacting international standards, it is exported to many technologically advanced countries, including Italy — its birth place.

WOODED BLISS

■ Grow More Trees is all the cry: they are thought to be a panacea for all ills, environmental or otherwise. And of course, two trees are better than one, which explains the unusual ceremony celebrated with much pomp and circumstance in a Kerala town recently.

For some time a middle-class colony of the town had been plagued with an increasing number of accidents. The residents hit upon the idea of joining two trees in holy wedlock to propitiate whichever of the gods was playing with their lives and property. The female of the species was a graceful neem and her bridegroom a majestic aspen.

Most of the endearing aspects of a human wedding were present. The neem, already a very attractive bride, was made even more so by draping her in a colourful sari. The aspen had his masculinity enhanced by a dhoti. Superbly-embossed invitation letters were sent out to colony residents. It wasn't a very expensive affair too, and the Rs 7,000 that was spent on it came from well-wishers. It remains to be seen if the leafy wedding will keep away evil spirits.

LOVE RIDE

■ Trekkers come in various shapes and sizes: those who take a brisk walk to the bus-stop, those who stagger along mountain paths, and those who go for a constitutional along the length and breadth of India. Sudhakar Rao, a personable young man, was of the last category, and he arrived in Vijayawada one day limping and asking for food and shelter.

The bigwigs of the town fell in love with him: for a whole day Rao's life was one large round of parties thrown by the police and other officials who lauded his perseverance and the ingenuity of the Indian shoe industry. Rao's ambition, he said, was to walk 35,000 km.

It was with great reluctance that the town let him carry on. The police gave him some money and patted him on his way but one doubting sub-inspector sent a constable after him. Rao was spied having a few drinks at a bar, and then caught red-footed just as he was boarding a bus to his next destination. Brought to the police station, he sighed and explained that a fruitless love affair was the reason behind his taking the world for a ride. The next walker who comes to Vijayawada will have his blisters carefully examined before he gets anything.

SEX MIX

■ Women are sometimes at the receiving end of telephone calls which are not exactly comme il faut. The immediate reaction of most women to such harassment is to slam the phone down. So the romeo at one end of the line in Delhi was pleasantly surprised when the sweet voice at the other end responded to his cooings with passionate billings. The conversation went something like this:

"You have a beautiful voice!"
"I'm a very beautiful person!"
"I want to meet you."
"I want to meet you, too."
"Where?"
"There's a nice cosy restaurant near X market."
"I'll be there."
"Cootchie-Koo"

The romeo put on his flashiest polyester, high heeled boots, did up his hair and went. He found a sweet young thing sitting at a table and sat down next to her. A few whispered exchanges took place. Queerly, the young thing wasn't showing him her face and it was only after a lot of coaxing that she did only to reveal the delicate feature of a young man with an obvious predilection for the similar sex.

DRIVER'S ARK

■ It never rains but it pours —in Bombay, at least. On one day last fortnight, Bombay nearly drowned in a deluge which lasted only three hours but seemed for those three hours to have brought back the miserably wet days of the flood. One of the places which looked like the great Salt Lake was a road in Colaba which was in eight feet of water. The only vehicle which could make it through was the sturdy BEST double-decker bus.

One gentleman wanted to get to the other side of Colaba and couldn't. His car had vanished under water and he was not willing to get his clothes wet by wading—swimming rather—through the lake. Half an hour of fretting and waiting for a BEST bus went by and he got increasingly desperate—it appeared that he had to get to a religious ceremony somewhere—and could be seen bobbing in and out of his house window at 11 a.m. However, he exited in triumph and soggy waders-by grinned in acknowledgement of a masterstroke—he was curled up in a plastic tub, floated for 200 yards or so to (comparatively) dry land, when he handed the tub to a shopkeeper and went on his way, whistling.

SUDERSHAN PLYWOOD

The profile of a market leader

Sudershan Plywood Industries Limited (SPI) manufactures at its factory in Assam a whole range of plywood, blockboards and flush doors which are marketed under the brand name of SWASTIK. In a span of just three years, SWASTIK Plywood products have emerged as market leaders. Swastik product range includes Commercial and Decorative Plywood, Marine Plywood, Plastic Coated Marine Plywood, Flush Doors, Blockboards etc. The marine grade boiling water proof plywood, more popularly known by its brand name Swastik Kitply is a household name today and is the largest selling plywood for furniture and panel inserts. SPI's committment to quality and an endeavour to constantly innovate new product features has earned it the trust and confidence of customers spread throughout the country. A fact aptly reflected in SPI's growing sales which stood at Rs.7.67 crores in 1984.

Encouraged by this supreme confidence of its customers SPI now embark upon a Rs.25 lac modernisation programme and new facilities to manufacture a special variety of plywood "Compreg Plywood" at a capital outlay of Rs.75 lacs. On completion of this modernisation and expansion programme in the next six months, SPI's productivity and profitability shall increase substantially and it is thus poised for an exciting future.

To raise resources for this investment programme, Sudershan Plywood will soon issue to the public 9,00,000 Equity Shares of Rs.10 each for cash at par — an opportunity for you to share its strong future.

AIR-INDIA

Unravelling the Clues

EVEN three weeks later, the images continued their haunting reminder of a tragedy that is still to be fully absorbed. At Bombay's Nariman Point, the famous hoarding fronting the Air-India headquarters was for once blank. But it was an emptiness more poignantly eloquent than a thousand words. Fringed with a black border, the hoarding spelled out the enormity of the disaster more starkly than a funeral flame. On the airline's subdued flights, crew members sported black bands as a symbol of mourning for not just their colleagues and the 329 passengers aboard the ill-fated Emperor Kanishka that had plunged into the Atlantic, but for an event that had sent reverberations of horror and outrage around the world.

And now, 6,000 ft under the choppy and freezing waters of the Atlantic off the Irish coast, the final moments of that tragedy were being played out as submersible robots finally succeeded last week in recovering what could provide the only clues as to what took place 31,000 ft above the sea when the giant 747 vanished from radar screens—the crucial black box or flight data recorder (FDR) and the cockpit voice recorder (CVR). The salvage operation, unprecedented in history in terms of the depth at which the recorders were recovered, climaxed an intensive preliminary investigation by the Government of India team which returned from Cork (Ireland) with what officials admit is a fair idea of the probable cause of the crash. But it appears a definitive verdict on the crash will have to await analysis of the tapes from the FDR (the virtually indestructible device known as the 'black box' though its actual colour is a phosphorescent orange), and the CVR. For nearly 20 days after the crash, all attention remained focused on the four-nation, five-ship operation to recover these recorders. Hopefully, once the black box and CVR tapes are decoded, Air-India will know what exactly happened at 0714 hours GMT on June 23 to make Kanishka suddenly disappear from the radar screens which were tracking the last leg of its flight from Montreal to London. The two devices were flown to Bombay as foreign experts doubted if they would reveal anything; a power failure would have put both recorders on the blink.

Even before the recovery of the recorders, the Government team which returned from Cork had, for all intents and purposes, ruled out structural failure and loss of engine power as probable causes of the crash. This is said to have been stated in the report submitted to the prime minister on the crash by Dr S.S. Sidhu, secretary of the Civil Aviation Ministry, who headed the team which included the director-general of civil aviation, explosives and anti-terrorism experts from the overseas intelligence agency RAW (Research and Analysis Wing), two doctors, one of whom specialises in aviation medicine, the air safety directors of the Civil Aviation Department, Air-India and Indian Airlines as well as some Indian Navy personnel.

Under ICAO rules when a plane crashes outside territorial waters, as happened in this case, the responsibility for conducting the preliminary inquiry devolves upon the country in which the plane was registered. This was the reason that the Sidhu team rushed to Cork. The team investigated three options. One, that the plane lost power in all its engines and ditched in the sea. Two, that there was massive structural failure such as a wing breaking off and this caused the 747 to tumble out of the sky and three, that a bomb explosion on board the aircraft or an unexplained pilot error brought Kanishka down. From the state of the wreckage recovered and the injuries on the bodies, the investigators appear to have ruled out the first two options. Said one of the investigators: "If either of this had happened it would still have given the cockpit crew enough time to give a May Day call to inform Shannon control tower that the plane was in trouble." An Air-India pilot endorsed this view saying, "Something went seriously wrong in the cockpit to prevent the two pilots from broadcasting a distress signal. Whatever happened, happened very fast." The tape recording of the Shannon airport control tower's efforts to raise Kanishka on the radio provides evidence that something had gone seriously wrong in the cockpit. The tape was sent for spectrum analysis to the Royal Aircraft Establishment at Farnborough (England) which has reportedly given the opinion that the crackling sounds on the tape indicated things been flung around the cabin. There was also a human scream in the background. The radio telephone in the Kanishka cockpit had either been accidentally left on or was switched on and it broadcast these sounds to Shannon air traffic control. These sounds, the investigators are virtually certain, followed an explosion in the aircraft.

This apart, the injuries to the 131 bodies recovered in the first 10 days indicated that the victims had died from the effects of decompression. If the plane had lost power and ditched in the sea the victims would have died of drowning. The post-mortem reports mention that some of the bodies had flailing injuries, which investigators said were caused by falling from a great height. Strangely, however, none of the recovered bodies had any burn marks and this initially led the team to question the bomb explosion theory. But then the alternate view was taken that the bodies found may not have been in the immediate vicinity of the explosion and hence escaped primary burn injuries. They had sustained the flailing injuries in the fall after the explosion.

The plane obviously did not break up at its cruising height of 31,000 ft as this would have dispersed the wreckage over a much larger area. In all probability the explosion-crippled 747 plunged out of control towards the sea and started breaking up only during the fall as a result of gravitational forces. This also explains the eyewitness report of the Panamanian ship captain who said he saw an explosion in the rear of the plane before it plunged into the sea. What the captain probably saw was the plane breaking up as it fell. The explosion had obviously occurred at 31,000 ft, the altitude transmitted to the Shannon control tower by the plane's transponder, a height at which no one at sea-level could possibly have seen an explosion.

The Air-India Managing Director Captain D. Bose, himself a 747 pilot, said: "There is a distinct possibility it was a bomb. From the analysis I have made it appears there was an explosion in the air so some of the bodies suffered from decompression injuries. I personally would like to discount structural failure. Human error too is ruled out. I cannot see how at 31,000 ft human error could cause a crash without (there being) any warning." Bose was the only one among senior Air-India and Civil Aviation Ministry officials to use the word 'bomb'. The others, including Minister Ashok Gehlot, would only say that there had been an explosion in the aircraft, with no way of knowing for sure what had caused the explosion. Gehlot said the salvage operation may not have met with such spectacular success had the Indian Government dithered about hiring the French ship 'Leon Thevenin' at $ 20,000 (Rs 2.5 lakh) a day to hunt for the black box. According to Gehlot the actual cost of chartering the ship was $ 50,000 (Rs 6.25 lakh) a day but the French had agreed to hire it out at operating cost for the black box salvage operation. Gehlot and Sidhu expressed India's thanks to the Irish, French and British authorities for their unstinting help after the crash.

MUKESH PARPIANI/The Daily

Though the two recorders have been recovered, the salvage ships continue to haul up more wreckage. Reports from Cork said that one ship had located and photographed a large section of the plane fuselage, nine metres long with eight rows of seats. This section is from the middle part of the cabin. One large section of a wing and a section of the tail have also been recovered.

But the fuller story of what happened to the Kanishka will be told by the FDR, a tiny computer which monitors every system on the plane, the actions of the pilots and the response from the aircraft, the search for which has cost some $ 20,000 a day. The black box tapes will, for instance, tell investigators whether or not the Kanishka's engines were functioning at the time of the crash. The tapes will also reveal how, if at all, the pilots responded to whatever emergency occurred aboard the plane.

The CVR may also help provide clues about what really went wrong in the cockpit. Any comment or exclamation by one or more members of cockpit crew would have been recorded by the CVR along with all the other conversation in the cockpit in the final 30 minutes of flight 182. But if the pilots were knocked out or incapacitated in a flash—a distinct possibility since it is known they did not even send out a distress signal—then the CVR is unlikely to uncover the mystery of the sounds recorded at the Shannon air traffic control.

For Air-India this has proved a costly crash because of the loss of crucial personnel. The insurers, Lloyds of London, will have to pay out between $ 130 and $ 150 million (Rs 150 crore to 180 crore) to Air-India to replace the lost aircraft and in compensation to the next of kin of those who died. Captain Bose said the next of kin would get up to $ 50,000 (Rs 6 lakh) each, and the prospect of such large compensation has already created conflicting claims: the airline's Delhi office is confronted with at least two such cases already.

The process of identifying the bodies has been an agonising one. With only 131 bodies recovered, few of those who made the trip to Cork were able to identify the remains of their relatives. S.V. Rao, who accompanied his younger brother Dr Sankurathri to identify the bodies of Mrs Manjari Sankurathri and her two children, said the Irish authorities were very careful not to expose all relatives who reached Cork to the trauma of viewing the decomposed bodies fished out of the sea.

The Cork police first asked him and his brother to write out a complete description of the three crash victims: their physical features, distinguishing marks, deformities, clothes they were wearing and so on. Then they were shown facsimile photographs of the bodies recovered and told to pick out any which looked like their relatives. While they were doing this some local nuns sat with them and consoled them. The Indian ambassador to Ireland was present at the hospital with Air-India representatives on both the days they spent there. The police brought out the post-mortem reports of the bodies matching the photos they had selected. These reports gave the age, physical description and build of the victims and Rao discovered that the bodies recovered did

SECURITY

Check List

AFTER the Kanishka crash, Air-India and Indian Airlines have been pestered by bomb hoaxes, which have resulted in extensive bomb checks, off-loading of baggage and passengers and inevitable delays. On one day last fortnight, Indian Airlines reported three false bomb alarms on its Delhi-Srinagar flights and a Delhi-Bombay flight. Delhi airport alone has been getting over one bomb-on-board call a day. The airport authorities and the airlines are complaining, the former because of the work involved in clearing a full plane-load of passengers after a bomb call; on an average it takes four hours to check and clear a 747 passenger load after a bomb call. This means bringing the suspect aircraft back to the ground with the fire brigade and emergency services standing by, emptying it of passengers, towing the aircraft to a remote corner of the airport, and checking it for hidden explosives. All the baggage is also unloaded and checked for explosives. Only then are the baggage and passengers put back on the aircraft before it is cleared for take-off. The chaos at the already disorganised airports would be unimaginable if a couple of widebody 747's or airbuses are grounded simultaneously.

Adding to the problem is the carelessness of passengers who leave their baggage lying around unclaimed before or after check-in. When this happens the police cordons off the area, the army's bomb disposal squad arrives on the scene, the suspect bags are gingerly loaded onto a trolley, covered with sandbags and wheeled out to a corner of the airport called the "cooling pit". There the bomb disposal squad carefully opens and inspects the bags for hidden bombs; no bomb has as yet been found but the bomb squad has instructions to defuse or detonate any explosive discovered. In one instance in June, a bag lying unclaimed in the domestic lounge was taken to the cooling pit and the lock blown open. The moment this happened a fountain of 100-rupee currency notes erupted out of the bag and officials of the International Airports Authority of India (IAAI), Indian Airlines and the police had to spend several hours in the hot sun counting the notes. The bounty exceeded Rs 14 lakh.

Ashok Gehlot: promising strict security

Air-India Managing Director Captain D. Bose announced at a press conference last fortnight in Delhi that AI has reviewed its security procedures and reiterated instructions to all station managers and on-line stations to tighten up, get all transit baggage checked and identified by passengers. "We have stopped carrying any perishables," he said, even though this would mean substantial loss to an airline that earns a lot of money ferrying vegetables, fruit, meat and other perishables to the Gulf. But the biggest step was the order to check all transit baggage. Nobody knew what this meant till all baggage on an Air France jet transiting through Bombay was off-loaded and checked before being loaded on again. "If this is done with all flights passing through Indian airports there is going to be chaos. Every flight through India will be delayed," an airline official complained. A few days later, however, it became known that the checking of the transiting Air France flight was a misunderstanding on the part of the airport authorities or an over-reaction to the orders to check transit baggage. Transit baggage is the baggage of a passenger who is changing airlines but has booked his bags to his destination. It is automatically taken off the plane by the first airline and sent off to be loaded on to the second. Till recently, such baggage was not checked but now orders have been issued to put it through an X-ray scanner. This poses no problem at an airport like Delhi, which has X-ray machines to scan checked-in baggage. Bombay airport does not, and passengers are asked to open all the bags for a security inspection prior to check-in. These bags are then wheeled on to the tarmac where they have to be personally identified by the passengers before they are loaded on to the aircraft. These additional precautions are aimed at preventing passengers from checking in their suitcases and going home; but in effect they mean passengers have to report for flights even earlier than they used to.

So worried are the authorities about bomb attacks on domestic flights that the Civil Aviation Department has issued a notification prohibiting all non-not include Mrs Sankurathri and the two children.

"We asked to see the jewellery found on the bodies, in the hope that that might provide a clue. Since the jewellery they showed us did not tally with what my sister-in-law was wearing when she had boarded the flight, we realised that her body had not been recovered." But the authorities asked them to come back the next day and go through the photographs again in case they had any doubts. With no bodies to take back home, Rao and his brother drove to a little bay about 50 miles from Cork; this was the nearest point to the crash site. They offered flowers and brought back some of the water to pour into a holy river in India.

Not surprisingly, the destruction of the Kanishka with so many people on board has resulted in a spate of cancellations on Air-India flights, including some foreign tour groups who booked flights several months in advance. An Air-India official admitted that there had already been a 5 per cent fall in bookings. A major Air-India agent in London said he alone had refunded 120 tickets in the first week after the crash. Bookings from London to India were already down 30 per cent he said. But the airline doesn't expect this to be a long-term effect. Public memory is short and if the flight recorder and cockpit voice recorder show conclusively that the airline and its crew were not responsible, no stigma need attach to Air-India's reputation. Even so, if it is clear that the Kanishka went down because of a terrorist bomb, then Air-India will have its hands full in coping with this new menace for a long time to come.

scheduled flights in north India without the department's prior permission. This means that all the chief ministers who used to keep flying in and out of the capital will now have to depend on regular Indian Airlines flights, unless they are willing to file flight plans with the Civil Aviation Department well in advance, every time they fly. This new restriction came to light when the doyen of Indian aviation, J.R.D. Tata, sought permission to land in Delhi in the Tata industries aircraft. He was informed that no unscheduled flight could land at Delhi without prior clearance from the Civil Aviation Department. These restrictions on non-scheduled air operations in North India may be an over-reaction but they are understandable in the immediate aftermath of the Kanishka tragedy.

That apart, all access by visitors to even the visitors' galleries of the domestic and international terminals has been stopped. Visitors have to crowd around the exit and jostle with other visitors to catch a glimpse of the passengers they have come to receive. Civil Aviation Minister Ashok Singh Gehlot said instructions had also been issued not to allow reception parties on to the tarmac to receive VIP's. Tarmac receptions would be permitted only for VVIP's. Gehlot said he had written to chief ministers of all states to cooperate in restricting access to the tarmac. "I also appeal to VIP's not to object when they are subjected to physical search and frisking at airports. How does the security staff at the airport know who is a VIP and who is not?" Gehlot also emphasised that security at the airports would not be allowed to suffer for want of funds.

The security cover of the main airports in India is said to be better today than it was four years ago, when saboteurs at Bombay's Santa Cruz airport succeeded in cutting the control cables of the Air-India Boeing 707 which was to take the then prime minister Indira Gandhi on an international tour. Subsequent investigations brought to light the miserable state of security at Bombay airport. The periphery wall was found to have been breached in several places by the nearby jhuggi dwellers, who use to troop in through the breached wall every day to use the grassy strip along the runway as a lavatory. Every time the airport authorities mended the wall, the jhuggi dwellers broke it down again, and, till the sabotage episode, the airport managers learned to live with this state of affairs. In fact one of these jhuggi women was lured into a parked Air-India plane and raped by two airline loaders. The woman later committed suicide.

IAAI has now posted armed sentries in pillboxes along the airport perimeter. A former senior official of the IAAI however complained that even though sentries had been posted at the pillboxes, they sat around playing cards with fire brigade personnel. "All the security steps you take are not going to work as long as you can bribe someone on the airport staff to plant a gun or bomb on board an aircraft," said a veteran pilot and aviation industry leader. And there are hundreds of low-paid persons at airports—loaders, catering staff, baggage handlers, sweepers and policemen—who are vulnerable to bribes. "As long as this possibility exists you cannot have foolproof security," the pilot scoffed. Moreover these loaders, cleaners and catering staff go in and out of the plane any number of times without anyone checking what they are bringing on board. AI pilots operating regularly to the Gulf say that every time a loader, cleaner or traffic assistant comes on board an aircraft at any major airport in the Gulf, he is checked at the foot of the stairs by airport security to see what he is bringing aboard. This happens irrespective of the number of trips the staff man makes. At Indian airports, on the other hand, this does not happen. Senior pilots operating a flight are physically frisked every time they come aboard, by airport security and additionally by the Air-India security staff, and they are not happy about it. A pilot said this meant that the airline was prepared to take the word of a security assistant with a year or two of experience compared to that of a pilot who had several years' experience flying aircraft worth crores of rupees. Gehlot too conceded that the new security measures would not amount to much unless all categories of staff at the airports realised their responsibility. He said this realisation had dawned after the Kanishka tragedy and the unions of airport workers had assured the managing directors of the two airlines of cooperation.

On their part, the cabin crew complain about the slackness of real security measures. In a letter to the Air-India management, the President of the Cabin Crew Association, Mohanbir Singh, has demanded adequate safety measures at some airports. He complained that even a week after the Kanishka crash, attempts were made to put unaccompanied baggage on board an Air-India flight at Bangkok and the flight was delayed for several hours after the cabin crew refused to accept the baggage. Air-India cabin crew were also threatened at Frankfurt and some bombs were found at the Heathrow Penta hotel were they were staying. This complaint only highlights the uncertainty and fear that crew members and passengers on Air-India and Indian Airlines flights will have to live with, as long as these flag carriers remain on the hit list of foreign-based or home-grown terrorists.

Stop polluted power from playing havoc with your NC or CNC machines and computers. And with your productivity, performance and profits. Order a KEC power conditioner immediately.

State-of-the-art NCs, CNCs or computer systems need state-of-the-art clean power to function. And perform in top form.

Voltage and frequency fluctuations, brownouts and blackouts..... they occur so often and so regularly in every part of the country, we have begun to take them for granted and have learnt to live with them. Unfortunately highly sensitive machines like NCs and CNCs cannot survive the onslaughts of polluted power.

The enemy within

All industry is going the way of NCs and CNCs to increase productivity, flexibility and efficiency. However, polluted power sabotages all these objectives.

How?

Polluted power leads to a disastrous chain reaction. Volta fluctuations damage the solid state devices in the NCs an CNCs while high frequency noise signals in the power sy can be misread by the microprocessors and cause malfunctions.

If an NC or CNC is programmed to do, let's say 55 operat on a job and a power fluctuation or breakdown occurs at 37th, in many cases the machine has to go back to square one and repeat every operation till the 37th opera If you compute what your factory is losing merely in terr downtime in a year, the figures will be staggering. The fig become even more alarming when expensive materials ar being handled and rejection costs go up substantially.

The worst, of course, is that polluted power not only undermines the performance of these expensive machine systematically reduces their life.

r stat f-the-art NC and CNC machines ble a polluted power system.

What will a KEC rotary power conditioner do?

First of all, however polluted your power supply, a KEC power conditioner will clean it up completely. It will hold frequency and voltage constant at the desired value. Now with a pollution-free power supply, downtime is brought down dramatically. Remember, each NC or CNC can have a separate power conditioner or a set of NCs and CNCs could share a single system.

So you see, a power conditioner pays for itself in a short time. And increases the longevity of your NCs and CNCs while maintaining peak performance levels.

Why don't you write to us? Or better still, call us up? Our engineers will be over within days and in consulation with you will decide upon the specific power conditioner or cluster of power conditioners you need.

Once you've got a KEC power conditioner, everything will be hunky-dory with your NC and CNC machines and you'll wonder how you ever managed without it.

HARYANA

Bhajan at Bay

AS GUJARAT'S Chief Minister Madhavsinh Solanki packed his bags last fortnight, all eyes turned to the Congress(I) chief minister who has lasted the longest—Haryana's unflappable Bhajan Lal. Ever since his infamous defection to the Congress(I) in 1979, the chief minister has successfully thwarted all efforts to remove him; even those attempted when Mrs Gandhi was alive. But Bhajan Lal, who has survived five assassination plots and countless other efforts by his political opponents to remove him, could have been anything but happy with the turn of events last week.

Shedding their mutual antagonism in a rare show of togetherness, the country's usually squabbling opposition groups came together to collectively present a memorandum to the prime minister containing specific allegations of corruption against the chief minister. The 45-page well-documented memorandum—drawn largely from an expose in The Statesman—specifically listed various acts of omission and commission of Bhajan Lal. The allegations acquired a respectability not so far gained by any of the countless allegations that Bhajan Lal has faced in the past when Rajiv Gandhi asked him to give his replies in writing. Rajiv's move was nothing revolutionary—asking for a reply is standard procedure for such allegations—but there was little doubt that his attitude to the memorandum was different from that of Mrs Indira Gandhi.

For one, he sent for a copy of the memo one day ahead of the meeting with the delegation of opposition leaders. When opposition leaders, led by Charan Singh, trooped in to meet him, the prime minister showed none of the impatience of Mrs Gandhi. So much so that even as staunch a critic as Lok Dal leader H.N. Bahuguna, who was in the delegation, expressed satisfaction, saying that although they would be required to substantiate their charges, "in any case, he told us he would meet us again before he took any decision on the matter."

The list of signatories to the memorandum was impressive: besides 20 sitting MLA's, it had been signed by Charan Singh and Bahuguna of the Lok Dal, L.K. Advani of the Bharatiya Janata Party and leaders of the CPI, CPI(M), RSP and the National Conference. The opposition leaders made it abundantly clear that they were taking the memorandum seriously were not willing to wait indefinitely for the prime minister to act. Bahuguna told a press conference that they regarded this as a test case for the prime minister's much-vaunted 'Mr Clean' image. If no proceedings were initiated against him, the opposition leaders would proceed to take the case to court.

Opposition leaders point out that the Santhanam Committee has clearly laid down that specific allegations against a minister in the states or in the Centre should be looked into by an agency whose findings will command respect. Nor would the Opposition confine itself to taking legal recourse. Bahuguna flew to Chandigarh to address a meeting of opposition parties and plans were being drawn up for street agitations.

RAGHU RAI

Bhajan Lal: protesting innocence

The memorandum is in two parts. The first deals with the industrial 'empire' of Bhajan Lal's son-in-law Anoop Bishnoi and the second lists specific allegations against the chief minister himself. The first part gives specific details about the role of nationalised banks and financial institutions in helping Bhajan Lal's son-in-law prosper. Bishnoi's family, the memorandum points out, did not own any property or land in Haryana before Anoop married Bhajan Lal's daughter. Bhupinder Bishnoi, Anoop's father, had started two industries, both of which later folded up. But after marriage, business flourished and Anoop came to own more than 20 firms, most of them located in Hissar.

The memorandum alleges that public financial institutions played no small part in this about-turn of fortunes, by extending liberal credit and assistance. The Haryana State Industrial Development Corporation lent Rs 2.40 crore, the Haryana Financial Corporation Rs 1.52 crore in several stages (clearing one application the same day it was received), the Punjab and Sind Bank (PSB) Rs 1 crore, the New Bank of India Rs 25 lakh and Punjab National Bank Rs 65 lakh in three letters of credit.

Loans and credit facilities are, of course, routine, but the Opposition memorandum alleges that in making these advances, the agencies concerned threw caution and rules to the winds. For instance, Bhanu Industries, the Bishnois' parent firm, purchased 92 kanals of land in Satrod Khan village on the Hissar-Delhi road (Registered sale deed number 1137 dated 27.5.81) for a sum of Rs 5.63 lakh. The land was mortgaged to the Haryana Financial Corporation on September 19, 1981, for a loan of Rs 30 lakh. Two years later, 32 kanals of the same plot of land was mortgaged by another Bishnoi firm, Bhanu Steels, for a loan of Rs 30 lakh from the same corporation.

Seemingly, even nationalised banks were pressurised into giving loans. The New Bank of India is said to have given loans of Rs 25 lakh to Bhanu Industries without mortgaging property and only on the basis of personal guarantees by some of the directors, who included Bhajan Lal's son-in-law and daughter. INDIA TODAY has also learnt that the PSB loan had violated two banking norms. A no-objection certificate had not been sought from the Punjab National Bank, their existing bankers. More important, the size of the loan was so big that it lowered the bank's statutory liquidity ratio below the stipulated minimum.

The second part of the memorandum, which deals with Bhajan Lal himself, refers to cases filed against him in the past: a criminal intimidation charge on August 28-1958, a charge of committing dacoity on May 5, 1969, a case of moral turpitude on November 3, 1962, and so on. Other charges include a reference to alleged land-grabbing by his nephew Ugar Sen (worth Rs 50 lakh) from the Fatehbad municipal committee and scandal of a bus-stop at Hissar (worth Rs 2 crore), among others.

Some of the allegations had been made on the floor of the Assembly and contemptuously dismissed by Bhajan Lal as unsubstantiated. He has filed a case against The Statesman and last fortnight he dismissed the memorandum as a "political conspiracy" to defame him because he had vanquished the opposition in the recent by-elections. A confident Bhajan Lal told INDIA TODAY: "These are old accusations that have been answered before. I have asked the Opposition to institute an inquiry headed by them to probe each and every one of the charges.." As for his son-in-law, Bhajan Lal clearly thinks that his educational background speaks for itself: management from the Indian Institute of Management, Ahmedabad; a degree from Delhi University's St. Stephen's College and, most important of all, schooling from the Doon School in Dehra Dun.

Politicians in Haryana point out that Bhajan Lal may find it easier to defend himself. As one said, politicians in Haryana are known to settle old scores by filing complaints at police stations which only pliant policemen ordinarily entertain. According to officials who enquire into such allegations, they first discreetly look for a prima facie case and then see if it can be proved in a court of law.

Bhajan Lal was quick to dispel the impression that Delhi had started the countdown immediately after Solanki's exit. But he was compelled to meet the prime minister a few days after the memorandum was submitted and the Bhajan Lal that met newsmen later at Delhi's Haryana Bhavan did not have his usual dismissive laugh for all slanderous accusations.

> "The Opposition's memorandum acquired respectability when Rajiv Gandhi asked Bhajan Lal to give his replies in writing."

Observers also point out that politically too the Congress(I) high command might seize this opportunity to cut Bhajan Lal down to size. Ever since he dramatically defected to the Congress(I) in 1979 his stock has been in the ascendant. In 1982 he again showed great—if opportunistic—skill in forming a government even though the Congress(I) won only 41 seats in the 90-member House. In the years since, he has consolidated his position even more. Dissidence has been contained by liberal perks: Haryana has 21 ministers, one chief parliamentary secretary, one parliamentary secretary and several chairmen of state corporations who thrive on government munificence.

The Opposition has been steadily demoralised, its most grevious blow coming in the Lok Sabha polls when all its stalwarts, including Devi Lal, were humbled. There are not many Congress(I) chief ministers who are politically as secure—and that too without much help from Delhi. On the contrary, it is Delhi which has used Bhajan Lal as an effective foil to the belligerence of the Akalis in Punjab. It would clearly be folly to underestimate the durable Lal, memorandum or no memorandum, though it will undoubtedly tax his wily skills should any of the dirt in the allegations manage to stick.

PUNJAB

Playing Safe

THE APPOINTMENT of retired major-general Rajinder Singh Sparrow as president of the PCC(I) may have come as a surprise to most politicians in the state, but not because it was necessarily a shrewd move loaded with significance. On the contrary, Sparrow, 74, is a political lightweight, and in his first utterances indicated that he knew precisely why he was there. Said he: "I am a soldier and shall go by the orders of my commander."

He got the job when at least two others, former foreign minister Swaran Singh and former Lok Sabha speaker G.S. Dhillon, turned it down. Clearly, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi who had just sacked Santokh Singh Randhawa from the job for alleged links with terrorists, wasn't too keen to get himself embroiled in any of the faction fighting that marks the state unit of the party. Sparrow belongs to no faction, and will be better placed to carry out Central directives and oversee some semblance of discipline in the party. With an experienced and astute governor in Arjun Singh, the high command obviously did not need a political heavyweight but a loyal implementor of the Centre's directives and policies. Said a senior Congress(I) leader: "Congress(I) issues are decided in the prime minister's house. What is a big leader needed for now? After the elections someone will emerge."

Sparrow, the fifth chief of the PCC(I) in quick succession, rode a crest of popularity in the aftermath of the 1965 war with Pakistan when he commanded a division in action in the western sector. He didn't join the Congress till 1970 and his tenure in the Lok Sabha, to which he was elected in 1980, has yet to match the glitter of his military career.

In New Delhi, many political observers were of the opinion Sparrow's selection meant that elections in Punjab were a long way away. Had elections been an immediate priority, the argument went, the man chosen to head the party's organisational unit would have been an experienced leader, not necessarily a conduit for the high command. That political acumen or seniority was not the main consideration in the selection of Sparrow was clear from the speeches made at his installation ceremony in

Sparrow (centre) at his installation and; (right) Longowal: guarded response

Chandigarh and his utterances at a news conference. Except for declaring that he was for a live and let live policy and that the Congress(I) would "take a conciliatory approach in dealing with any other political party" the rest, he said, would be decided by the party high command.

The usually loquacious and amiable Sparrow parried questions on the Anandpur Sahib resolution, the Akalis and other Punjab issues by saying: "All this has been chewed upon for so long. What comment can I make?" However, he did say Akali Dal President Harchand Singh Longowal was on the right track.

But his task will by no means be easy. Even 10 days after his appointment he had not been able to choose his general secretaries or the PCC(I) executive. The party has not had any elections for the last six years. His predecessor Randhawa's rivals, Punjab Youth Congress president Partap Singh Bajwa and his father Satnam Singh Bajwa, who was removed from the Gurdaspur district presidentship, are not yet down and out, and choosing their successors will be a formidable job. Present indication are that Jagmeet Singh Brar, an able administrator who last fortnight quit his post as member of the Punjab State Electricity Board, might take over as Youth Congress president.

Punjab is moving towards normalcy at yet another level. The Centre has taken the decision to release a large number of arrested Sikhs and thus create a climate of conciliation in the state. Virtually every day, Governor Arjun Singh releases lists of those freed from the jails. By the end of last fortnight he had ordered freed 1,215 out of a total of around 4,000 detenus. Most newspapers have applauded his action. "It is a step, a definite step in the right direction but more such steps should follow to ease the situation and restore confidence among the Sikhs," said Brijinder Singh, editor of the leading Punjabi daily Ajit.

THE AKALI response was a bit more guarded. "The Government is making out it has done everything to create the atmosphere for negotiations but we consider it only a small step," said former chief minister Prakash Singh Badal. Longowal and SGPC President Gurcharan Singh Tohra were skeptical. "We are yet to be convinced of the sincerity and honesty of Rajiv Gandhi's Government. All hurdles must be removed before we can start negotiations," said Longowal and went on to suggest that the Government could do this by scrapping the special courts, withdrawing all anti-terrorist laws, treating army deserters with compassion, releasing all Sikhs in detention and ordering a judicial inquiry into riots in the wake of Mrs Gandhi's assassination.

In spite of the discordant notes, the Government's measures are having the healing impact they were expected to. Indeed, privately, many Akalis concede as much, pointing specially to the removal of the ban on the All India Sikh Students Federation and economic concessions already announced such as the construction of the Thein dam.

The prime minister's conciliatory statement at his press conference in Delhi last fortnight that Longowal "had taken positive steps and deserves our congratulations" was reciprocated by Longowal when he told INDIA TODAY: "Let Rajiv come out with other positive steps. We shall not lack response as nobody is more serious than us to bring peace and honour back to Punjab."

Another positive sign is that Longowal has emerged stronger vis-a-vis the rival Akali Dal and in relation to Badal and Tohra in his own party. He was authorised to take action against six Badal supporters who had gone over to the rival Akali Dal, including former minister Atma Singh, Ujagar Singh Sekhon, P.S. Majitha and R.S. Brahmpura.

Expecting a further easing of the situation and more positive steps by the Government, the Akali Dal (Longowal) leadership has given the Centre some breathing space by postponing decisions on the next phase of its morcha to August 20. The present thaw in the situation could prove very valuable if properly utilised. Otherwise the terrorists might once again seek to dispel the hope that is now again becoming evident in the state. Last fortnight's attempt on the life of Ludhiana Senior Superintendent of Police A.P. Pandey was ominous. It was believed to have been masterminded by a known terrorist gang led by Sukhdev Singh "Babbar". Things may be looking up in Punjab but the spectre of terrorism casts a long shadow. —GOBIND THUKRAL

Transfer Row

POLITICAL meddling raises no eyebrows in Uttar Pradesh's corridors of power but this time there is a new twist to an old tale. State Director-General of Police(DGP) J.N. Chaturvedi has raised the hackles of his political and administrative bosses by directing his subordinates to ignore any transfer and posting orders not routed through him. His directive not only laid bare the blatant disregard of guidelines governing such transfers but also the selective basis on which it operates.

"No instructions regarding transfers and postings from above will be complied with without my prior clearance."

J.N. CHATURVEDI
director-general of police

Chaturvedi's demi-official circular dated February 14, 1985, would never have come to light but for a probe ordered by the state Government into the delay in implementation of transfer orders to officers of the rank of deputy inspector general and below. The officers had not moved to their new postings because of the DGP's circular. "It stated: "Instances have come to my notice in which instructions were reviewed directly by the officers at different levels in the office of the chief minister, state minister for home and the Home Department regarding transfers and postings ... These directions were complied with with no reference to this office. It is therefore laid down that no instruction of the above-mentioned type will be complied with without my prior clearance."

The circular created a flap. An angry Bhola Nath Tiwari, state home secretary, said: "He should not have issued such orders. After all we are functioning in a democratic set-up. We, the Government, have to look after the interest of several departments while the DGP is just in charge of one department." But the directive was indicative of Chaturvedi's concern over what he saw as encroachment on his powers. Time and again the Government had either ignored his recommendations for transfer or reversed them. For instance:

► Harbhajan Singh was posted as senior superintendent in the CID and later in the Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) by the DGP but the state Government cancelled these orders and put him in charge of Ghazipur district;

► D.K. Singh, deputy superintendent of Ghaziabad, was, also moved to the CID but went back after some politicians intervened;

► Ram Ujagar Singh, station house officer, Gonda, got his transfer orders to the CID reversed by the chief minister's office;

► Vishnu Mishra, a junior inspector in a Lucknow police station, was sent to Jhansi by the DGP but the chief minister's office again intervened and stayed it;

► Hari Shankar Shukla, a senior inspector in Lucknow, had his transfer orders cancelled thrice by the chief minister's office.

It was obvious that politicians were behind these decisions but what irritated Chaturvedi was the fact that officers of the rank of deputy superintendent and below were being moved around like chess pieces while he helplessly looked on. The fact that over 2,500 of 3,000-odd transfers were in the police department alone was another measure of his desperation. And the justifications cited—"public interest" and "in the interest of the administration"—fooled no one.

Leaders of the ruling party admitted that it is only through police officers at the local level that they are able to influence voters, harass their opponents and collect donations for elections and party purposes. Said one Congress(I) MLA: "If a thana in charge is not with you, you cannot do any politics in your area. It is these officials on whom we depend for our political career and we have to protect them."

The manoeuvrings by politicians are also beginning to affect the officers of the Indian Police Service (IPS) cadre. Over 27 of the 52 SP's and SSP's were moved out in less than 18 months when the rules require them to serve a two to three-year term. DIG Ram Asrey, SSP I.P. Bhatnagar and SP Brijender Singh were transferred out of Gorakhpur district without even completing a year. The fact that officers were instrumental in curbing the eastern Uttar Pradesh mafia is a pointer to the reason behind their removal.

The axe also fell on officers in the dacoit-infested districts of Etah, Mainpuri, Etawah and Jalaun. It is a fact that only those who figure in the ruling clique's good books get their quota of transfers. This was illustrated in the case of S.K. Tripathi, SSP Deoria, who was charged with failing to handle the crime problem in his district by nine MLA's led by Raj Mangal Pandey, MP. The DGP transferred him on the basis of their evidence but his orders were stayed by the Home Department and Tripathi stayed put.

"We have to look after the interest of several departments while the DGP is just in charge of one department."

BHOLA NATH TIWARI
state home secretary

Said B.P. Bharati, MLA from Deoria: "We have met the DGP several times with all the facts against Tripathi but we know that so long as he has the protection of the Home Department he cannot be transferred. We are going to take up this matter at the highest level."

But, as a senior IPS officer says: "We go to a district, admit our children in schools and try to study the life of the land. But before we can do so, we are sent off to other districts. At present its impact is not visible but it will be known after few months."

That statement is warning enough of the folly behind such motivated transfers but then, to politicians only the immediate matters.

DDA

Shaky Foundations

ONE OF the largest and most controversial monoliths in the capital, the Delhi Development Authority (DDA), is currently in the throes of a shake-up of a kind it has rarely experienced in its last 20 tumultuous years. One of the organisation's chief engineers, R.A. Khemani, has been suspended and, in an unprecedented move, the Government has decided to institute a criminal case against him. The Lt-Governor of Delhi, M.M.K. Wali, is reportedly preparing a list of engineers in the organisation with a dubious record. The corridors of Vikas Minar, the DDA's high-rise headquarters, are thick with speculation that once Wali locates this 'deadwood', the engineers will be given a golden handshake and sent home. DDA's minister-in-charge, Union Works and Housing Minister Abdul Ghafoor, is determined that this time the organisation's Augean stables will be cleaned. As a determined-looking Ghafoor told INDIA TODAY: "This (corruption in the DDA) is an old malaise and it will take time to set things right."

The DDA, charged with the major responsibility of developing real estate in the capital, has—not without reason—long been the capital's favourite whipping boy. But, last fortnight, for the first time, it came under fire right from the top. Speaking at the first meeting of the National Capital Board, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi launched into an unexpected burst of criticism of the DDA. Addressing the Union minister directly, Rajiv said: "Ghafoorji, things cannot go on like this ....the DDA was building houses but forgot to lay the foundation....merely blaming the junior engineers will not solve the problem."

After this ticking-off in public, the minister had no choice but to wield the big axe. The result was Khemani's suspension—the first time in DDA's history that a chief engineer had been suspended. Officially, no reason was given for the drastic action and a shaken Khemani was still waiting for the formal charge sheet from the Government. But the reasons had already received enough publicity in the media: a remarkably shoddy piece of workmanship by DDA engineers who built 140 three-storeyed houses in Kishangarh without a foundation which could meet the safety norms.

Ironically enough, the foundation scandal, which the prime minister seemed to have pulled out of his hat, had actually been uncovered by Khemani's own engineers one-and-a-half years earlier. And it was not as if nothing had happened subsequently. Khemani had recommended action against junior engineers involved and had also suggested that the concerned contractors be blacklisted. Meanwhile, discussions had been held with engineering dons from the Indian Institute of Technology on how to salvage the flats, which were never actually allotted. Remedial efforts were already underway when the prime minister suddenly raked up the controversy.

Not without reason. Typically, nobody in the DDA had yet been made to pay for the lapses. Khemani's file recommending disciplinary action had moved from one desultory official in the DDA to another and had finally landed on Ghafoor's table on May 23. DDA's Vice-Chairman Prem Kumar, who had come to know of this lapse last December, defends the lack of action against the defaulters by arguing that there was nothing to suggest that the chief engineer had recommended strong action.

RAGHU RAI

Abdul Ghafoor: forced to act

The dithering on the disciplinary action was typical of the way the DDA works. Admits Prem Kumar: "We have to evolve a new culture and we are working towards it." But clearly not everybody in the DDA is willing to be introspective. Many DDA officials argue that chief engineers cannot be held responsible for such lapses. Most DDA contracts are signed by executive engineers and, says Khemani, "superintending engineers and chief engineers are (merely) administrative officers."

While the suspension of Khemani may be technically questionable, there is no denying the fact that the DDA was in need of a "strong dose of bitter medicine," as one official puts it. Said Ghafoor: "If engineers can take commissions (we all know they do) they can't turn around and say they can't be held responsible for the lapses." The idea clearly is to throw a scare into officials who had their hands in the till. If so, it was rather long in coming. With a budget of around Rs 1 crore a day the DDA is a money-spinner for corrupt officials. It is believed that commissions for officials who manipulate contracts and housing allotments range from Rs 5,000 to Rs 25,000.

But it was not the size of the commissions alone which was shocking. In an exhaustive report in August 1984, Parliament's Estimates Committee noted that DDA officials accused of corruption and graft by the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) had been let off in an inexplicable manner. The CBI had investigated 21 cases of serious irregularities involving as many as 73 officials and departmental action had been recommended in four cases involving 32 DDA officials. The lapses mainly pertained to making "bogus entries" of earth filling in the resettlement colony of Trilokpuri, home for thousands of lower class government employees. "Bogus certificates" for non-existent trips made by trucks had also found mention in the report.

RAMESH GULATI

To the utter surprise of the committee, the DDA—in consultation with the Vigilance Commission—had dropped all the cases. This action had prompted the parliamentarians to observe: "The committee is unable to appreciate why instead of taking deterrent action against erring officials the DDA dropped the cases. The fact that the Vigilance Commission too has acquiesced to this course is unfortunate.... If officials who after thorough investigation are found guilty and let off in this manner, it will encourage rather than contain corruption in the DDA."

The Estimates Committee, whose report has not received the attention it deserves, was constrained to quote the 'glaring example' of an Additional Chief Engineer, R.S. Jindal, whose suspension was revoked by the Central Government in December on the excuse that it was not clear who had suspended him, the vice-chairman or the Lt-Governor. Even the Vigilance Commission, had called for strong action against Jindal in a case involving the Delhi Municipal Corporation, but the DDA had sought closure of the case. Even after the commission threatened to include the case in its annual report, the DDA sat pat. "What is more amazing," said the report, "even after the Lt.-Governor had passed orders for major penalty proceedings against him, the DDA refused to do so pleading that the officer had represented against the proceedings."

Prem Kumar: on the defensive

Such is the extent of corruption in the DDA that it is hardly surprising that competition is intense among engineers posted in the four different zones for allotment of housing construction contracts. Of course, the casualty in the process is the quality of construction which is unformly substandard. "Of the 60,000 houses built by the DDA in the past four years, 20,000 are substandard and 2,000 are unfit for occupation," alleged Madanlal Khurana, BJP leader of the Opposition in the Delhi Metropolitan Council.

While both Ghafoor and Prem Kumar have promised a thorough overhaul of the organisation, the fact is in the last six months that both have been at the helm, they did not initiate any house cleaning, till the prime minister spoke out. In fact, many doubt Kumar's credibility, considering that there are serious allegations that he had a hand in the out-of-turn allotment of houses when, in fact, he can do that only on compassionate grounds. Kumar has strongly denied any wrongdoing and has pointed out that he and the Lt-Governor have made only 145 out-of-turn "exchanges" where those already allotted accommodation wanted to shift elsewhere. As for another allegation, that VIP's like Arun Nehru, Union minister of state for power, was allowed to shift to a place of his choice, Kumar claimed this was simply because Nehru argued it would be difficult to live in a top-storey apartment block without a lift.

Kumar told INDIA TODAY: "I went with Mr Nehru to his house and realised that he had to pant to climb three floors." Other officials have also denied that residents of west Delhi DDA flats were allowed to shift to the more exclusive DDA colonies in south Delhi. But the very fact that allegations involving top officials were gaining currency was reason enough for Ghafoor to get things moving. He has invited the Tata Consultancy Service to suggest certain changes in the working of the DDA so that the organisation can hold senior officials responsible for their actions. "As things stand," says Ghafoor, "the DDA vice-chairman is responsible for everything. We will introduce decentralisation so that power is transferred to others. We also plan to introduce double entry system so that there is a separate entry of the contracts signed with the builder. This will ensure that venal engineers do not change contracts to suit the needs of their pockets. Also we want to take the help of chartered accountants in evolving a better accounting system."

While these measures are still in the pipeline, the response so far has not been very indicative of a change for the better in the DDA. Commenting on Ghafoor's corrective proposal, one engineer said tongue firmly in cheek: "These are twenty-first century solutions. What corrupt engineers need is the age-old eighteenth century medicine—a kick in the pants."

WEST BENGAL

Unsettled Phase

ARE ANY municipal elections so important that if the Congress(I) fails to win them, the PCC(I) chief should think it necessary to submit his resignation? If the city happens to be Calcutta, if the Congress(I) loses to the Left Front and if the the PCC(I) chief happens to be Pranab Mukherjee, then the answer can only be yes. And then a mere civic poll ceases to be of interest and relevance only to the citizens of that state, let alone the city; it grabs major headlines around the country as did the June 30 poll to the Calcutta Municipal Corporation.

The results themselves were dramatic enough: of 141 wards, the Left Front won 70 (the CPI-M getting 49), the Congress (I) 67, the Bharatiya Janata Party two and Independents two. As a matter of fact, the Left Front polled 18,469 votes less than the Congress(I) and to achieve a majority in the municipal council had to take the unprecedented step of admitting an independent councillor, Abdul Khaleque, who had contested against the official Left Front candidate.

The main focus, however, was on the Congress(I) which had hoped, with good reason, to win the elections. In the 1982 assembly elections it had snatched 12 out of 25 seats in the city; in last year's Lok Sabha elections it had won in 114 wards in the city. With this impressive record in a state otherwise dominated by the Marxists, it had this time round pulled out all stops. Apart from throwing political heavyweights, including the popular former Union railway minister A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury, into the campaign, it did a sharp turnabout and inducted former chief minister Siddhartha Shankar Ray into the campaign though Ray is not a member of the party. And yet it lost.

Recrimination within the party was not long in coming. Union Law Minister Asoke Sen, who had crossed swords with Mukherjee in the selection of candidates, called the defeat a "debacle" and commented: "Some young party leaders divided the city among themselves and gave nominations at will. Obviously the discerning voters of the city did not vote for those with a bad image. Our paper tigers can roar but cannot win elections." It was clear that Sen, who commands the loyalty of a small group of Congress(I) men led by Priya Ranjan Das Munshi but who has been not allowed much of a say in state politics since Mukherjee took over in April, felt that this was the moment to strike at his opponents within the party.

But Sen had underestimated Mukherjee's political acumen. The very next day, Mukherjee too called a press conference and handed out a four-line written statement. Taking full responsibility for the party's defeat, the statement announced his decision to resign "in conformity with the democratic traditions and culture of the Congress(I)".

Events thereafter moved fast and on predictable lines: his supporters in Calcutta issued statements criticising Sen and urging Mukherjee to take back his resignation; AICC(I) General Secretary in charge of West Bengal, Mrs Rajendra Kumari Bajpai, opined in Delhi that it was unlikely that the resignation would be accepted; and the issue was finally settled in a 22-minute meeting that Mukherjee had with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi where it is believed that he asked Mukherjee not to press his resignation.

Mukherjee had good reason to be satisfied with the turn of events. He is known to be not so keen about pursuing politics in West Bengal where he does not have a political base. For somebody who was once No. 2 in the Union Cabinet, state politics can only be worth his while if the chief ministership is the ultimate prize. With waning Left Front popularity in Bengal and paucity of local talent in the Congress(I), Mukherjee should fancy his chances of getting the pot at the end of the rainbow but for that he would first have to emerge as the number one in the state unit of the party.

With so much at stake, defeat in a crucial poll which the party was expected to win could have turned into a decidedly sticky situation for Mukherjee. But by his dramatic resignation he has clearly turned the situation around in his favour. Sources close to him maintain that he has been promised a free hand by the high command in constituting the district committees. Apart from Sen, all his other detractors within the party, were compelled to publicly appreciate his good work for the polls, ask him to withdraw his resignation and pledge their unstinted support to him. Said Ghani Khan Chowdhury: "The Congress(I) is not a regimented political party so it is difficult to pin responsibility, but there is little doubt that Pranab worked hard for victory." But perhaps the most intriguing was known Mukherjee supporter Subrata Mukherjee's statement that "it is against the Congress(I) culture for a PCC chief to resign because of an electoral reverse".

Mukherjee had emerged unscathed from the rubble of defeat but the party's image was badly sullied in the public mud-flinging that followed. Reacting to Sen's remarks on the wrong selection of candidates, Mukherjee confined himself to stating that the choice of candidates had "no bearing whatsoever on the results". In an obvious snipe at Sen, he added: "Responsible people should make responsible statements." Privately he was known to blame Sen's garrulousness to his age (74). Subrata Mukherjee was not as inhibited. "Who is Mr Asoke Sen?" he asked, "he was out of the country for the most part of the election." Somen Mitra added that it was "unwise and unethical on Asoke Sen's part to hold specific people responsible for the defeat and make his opinions public". As both Mukherjee and Mitra pointed out, most of the party's candidates labelled antisocials by the media—like Bomb Bishu, Gaalkata Neeloo and China—had won. Mitra feels that it is time that the party high command appreciated their efforts.

There was, similarly, great resentment in state party circles at the last-minute induction of Ray into the campaign. Mukherjee's followers are convinced that the move was aimed at undermining the PCC(I) chief's position. Mukherjee maintained he had decided to accept Ray's offer to help out because "anybody saying 'vote Congress' cannot harm the party". But clearly Mukherjee never entertained great hopes from Ray. "We must remember," he says, "that Ray was the chief minister when the municipal elections were last held and then the Congress had won only 22 seats out of 100." Mukherjee nevertheless arranged for Ray to address meetings but one person who refused to share a public platform with Ray was Ghani Khan Chowdhury. As Ghani Khan Chowdhury told INDIA TODAY: "We don't know who sent him. Pranab did not tell us anything. I thought this (any involvement with him) would cause a controversy so I decided to oppose him."

There was a point in Ghani Khan Chowdhury's complaint of the state unit having been kept in the dark. It was never really clear who had sent him. Mukherjee was quoted as saying that Makhan Lal Fotedar, political aide to the prime minister, had phoned him to accept Ray's offer but Mukherjee denies having said anything to the effect. Arun Nehru, Union minister of state for power and confidant of the prime minister, confounded confusion when he declared that Ray did not have Rajiv's sanction. "This mystery must be solved," said Subrata Mukherjee but there was no solution yet.

What leaders like Subrata Mukherjee, Somen Mitra and Prafulla Kanti Ghosh have been saying in so many words is that the era of bhadralok politics in West Bengal is over and the Congress(I) must rely on its grassroots muscle power for survival. Leaders like Sen and Ray to them are anachronisms, at best useless and at worst liabilities. "Why can't Ray do something about our supporters who are being attacked and killed all over the state?" asks Subrata Mukherjee, adding: "We are the only ones who can stand the Left Front's assaults." Pranab Mukherjee does not go quite as far admitted that "the Congress(I) has to be tough to protect itself in the state."

The Congress(I) has also to admit that it had been politically outsmarted by the Left Front. Five years ago, the state Government amended the Calcutta Municipality Act and brought in 41 more wards into the Calcutta Municipal Corporation. These wards—which embrace three assembly constituencies of Jadavpur, Behala and Garden Reach—have been the Front's vote pockets. Their inclusion contributed not a little to the Front's win: they took 29 of these 41 seats. The Congress(I) could derive little consolation from its victory in 56 of the original 100 wards.

There was other evidence as well that the Front would play it very tough. The preparations of the municipal poll voters' list was another case in point. From a 31-lakh-strong list for the Lok Sabha poll six months ago, the list was whittled down to 25 lakh, whereas, as Mukherjee pointed out, there should have been a 3 per cent increase. Ghani Khan Chowdhury believes that striking off so many voters was the main reason for the party's defeat. How such a large number of names were struck off has not been satisfactorily explained by the Marxists, who are nevertheless secure as the municipal election does not come under the jurisdiction of the Central Election Commission.

Even so, Left Front Chairman Saroj Mukherjee could not but admit that they were "not happy" about the poll results. But just how much winning the polls mattered to the Leftists was demonstrated by their alacrity in admitting Khaleque. Forward Bloc leader Ashok Ghosh had to suffer the embarrassment of issuing a statement welcoming Khaleque's induction and explaining that this had been "done in the larger interests of the Front", which Mukherjee quickly dubbed as "pure political opportunism".

Khaleque's admission afforded the Forward Bloc an opportunity to demand that the post of deputy mayor should be rotated among the three Front constituents, the Communist Party of India, the Revolutionary Socialist Party and the Forward Bloc. Protracted negotiations followed, each constituent party seeking to maximise its share of key administrative posts in the municipality. A crisis was ultimately averted by the CPI(M)'s decision to allow the other three Front parties to appoint an alderman each, keeping the mayor's post for the Marxist nominee Kamal Bose and allowing the CPI to nominate Moni Sanyal for the deputy mayor's post.

Such wranglings have become so common in the Front that they now do not even cause much concern to the Front leadership. Political observers see points of concern in other areas. The equivocalness of the city vote, the infighting among Congress(I) men with the state unit headed by somebody fighting for his political survival, the increasing street warfare between the Congress(I) and the Front partners—all make for an unsettled phase in West Bengal politics. That is perhaps the most disturbing aspect of what would otherwise have been a routine municipal poll.

Ban Voyage

IN THE days of the Raj, ritual vacation time for Bengal's rulers was summer, a time for retreating to the coolth of Darjeeling or Kalimpong. The state's present-day Marxist rulers, however, seem to prefer the monsoons: a grey, humid period of devastating waterlogging, for vacationing. This year, perhaps to compensate for the gruelling Calcutta civic poll campaign, a number of senior leaders have made a beeline for the temperate climates of Europe.

Chief Minister Jyoti Basu left for the UK on July 9 for a three-week tour in the hope of getting, among other things, a bit of rest. On the official side, Basu said he would have to attend a cultural programme being organised by London's Bengali community with the help of the London Greater Council's cultural section.

What has proved galling for Chief Minister Basu is the Government regulation about ministers not being able to leave the country without clearance from New Delhi. Speaking to newsmen on the eve of his departure to the UK, Basu expostulated that Delhi was treating "them like slaves". Basu's own clearance had come just a day before his scheduled departure, while state Industry Minister Professor Nirmal Bose's application for visiting London during his European visit was turned down. "It seems the ministers are not free citizens," remarked an indignant Basu.

Professor Bose, who had included London in his European itinerary in order to hold talks with representatives of the India Investment Centre for prospective investment in West Bengal, was asked to restrict himself to travelling on the continent. "The Centre in its communication to the state Government argued that since Basu: Centre's "slave"?

Chief Minister Basu was going to London there was no need for the industry minister to follow suit," said a state government official.

"There is nothing inequitous about New Delhi not clearing every minister's application for foreign travel considering that the Government pays for the air fare and daily allowance of approved trips," explained former Union minister Saugata Ray, referring to Bose's European tour, which was basically motivated for attending a conference on political systems in Paris. Professor Bose's connection with socialist bloc political theorists and academics apparently assures him regular visits to the Warsaw Pact countries.

Apart from the chief minister and Bose, the other Left Front ministers abroad last fortnight were the state Finance Minister Dr Ashok Mitra, Education Minister Sambhu Ghosh, and Transport Minister Rabin Mukherjee. Another delegation of Left Front leaders, including former Forward Bloc minister Bhakti Mondal, had left for China.

The departure of so many ministers, including Chief Minister Basu, who is officiating as finance minister, could not have come at a more inopportune time considering that the Centre has decided to stop overdrafts to the states. In the event of a major financial crunch it is not unlikely that the working of the state Government will come to a grinding halt. And it is strange that the critical job of state finances has been largely left to bureaucrats, a breed that the Left Front has never publicly trusted.

All the same, Left Front leaders feel that they might not get another opportunity in the near future to go on a vacation. For, as a leader of the West Bengal Socialist Party pointed out, the CPI(M)'s party congress will be held later this year to flag off an intensive campaign for revamping the party's organisation, image and increase membership. The idea is to shore up front support in preparation for the next assembly polls. Before the really busy months begin, remarked the Socialist Party leader, "some front leaders are doing what Central ministers have always done".

JAMMU & KASHMIR

Prestige Price

When Ghulam Mohammed Shah completed a year in office as chief minister Jammu & Kashmir, the occasion was celebrated with the usual pomp last fortnight. But the festivities may yet prove a bit premature. The Congress(I), which was responsible for putting Shah in power in the first place, has been reviewing its decision to support a government which had faced ten bandhs in as many months and had failed to give the state a stable, effective government. Nor has Shah fulfilled his promise that he would contain Farooq Abdullah's agitations and erode his base in the valley. Farooq has held his flock together and poses a major threat to both Begum Khalida Shah's National Conference (NC-K) and the Congress(I). Admitted a Congress(I) leader: "Shah has not delivered."

The Congress(I)'s decision to review its support for Shah was prompted by the massive response to an opposition-sponsored bandh on July 2, the day of the anniversary. But annoyance with the Shah Government had been reflected earlier at a Congress(I) workers' convention in the valley last month, attended by some 400 participants, where at least 50 members made vitriolic speeches against Shah in the presence of Union Health Minister Mohsina Kidwai and AICC(I) General Secretary Rajendra Kumari Bajpai. Afterwards, state Congress(I) President Mufti Mohammad Sayeed disclosed that the Congress(I) would formally request Shah to take it into confidence on all important policy matters.

This turn of events was significant, coming as it did not long after the formation of a 12-member coordinating committee of the NC(K) and Congress(I) to sort out problems between the two parties. The Congress(I)'s decision to take an active interest in the state Government came close on the heels of Union Minister of State for Power and party strongman Arun Nehru's visit to the state in the first week of June. An NC(K)-Congress(I) coalition would have created more problems for the Congress(I) than it solved due to basic differences of approach to various policy matters and the sharing of power as well as bring on the stigma of joining a defectors' government. The Congress(I) therefore decided to run the state Government without participating in it directly.

It was soon after Kidwai and Bajpai returned to Delhi that the high command decided to revise its attitude towards the Shah Government. A section of the Central leadership had even earlier proposed a strategy of rapprochement with Farooq because it was felt that political uncertainty in Kashmir could not end without Farooq's involvement. And during the last six months various Central leaders, including the prime minister have met Farooq or his emissaries to try and arrive at some agreement, but to no avail. The Congress(I) is willing to drop Shah and install a new interim chief minister pending elections to the Assembly, but Farooq is not agreeable to this.

Says Farooq: "My top priority is to get this defectors' government out of office. And how can I agree to yet another defector forming a government? Let there be a spell of governor's rule followed by assembly elections. We should follow well established democratic norms." But the Congress(I) is hesitant to grant Farooq's terms, for it is not in a position to dislodge Farooq from the valley where he holds undisputed sway. Moreover by restoring Farooq to the chief ministership it would be admitting its mistake in propping up Shah.

Farooq meanwhile has kept his promise that he would fight the Shah Government only through peaceful means. But last fortnight it seemed his patience was wearing thin when he threatened that a situation similar to that in Punjab and Gujarat could arise in Kashmir as well. "If they continuously go on denying democracy to the people of this state, I am afraid it would lead to a Punjab-like situation. Then there will be no turning point, I fear." Added Sheikh Nazir, NC(F) general secretary: "This drama of a puppet government cannot go on for too long. The voice of the people will ultimately prevail and the Centre will have to bow before it. And we will not rest till this government is thrown out."

Cartoon by NINAN

With Farooq flexing his muscles and the Congress(I) reviewing its strategy, Shah could sense he was on a sticky wicket. He has made overtures to his brother-in-law for some sort of agreement, and influential friends of the family have tried to intervene on his behalf. But his efforts were doomed to failure as he was not prepared to quit in Farooq's favour, his supporters instead mooting the idea that Farooq's mother Begum Abdullah be installed as chief minister for the time being. But NC(F) insiders claim Begum Abdullah is more hostile towards Shah than even Farooq, who must have been echoing his mother when he said derisively: "I will not pray at his(Shah's) grave even when he is dead. They should not think we are weak. We can make their life miserable." That was an ominous message for both Shah and the Congress(I).

BOMBAY

Shady Deal

EVERY scandal in bursting Bombay seems to be connected with land. Even so, the affaire that unfolded last fortnight was startling. In central Bombay, 23,000 sq m of land, part of it meant for the rehabilitation of slum dwellers had been coolly sold off to a single builder by no less a personage than the Government of Maharashtra itself in unseemly haste. As Ram Nayak, the Bharatiya Janata Party MLA who broke the scandal in the Assembly, said: "This out-Antulay's Antulay."

The patch in question is part of a 1,262-hectare stretch of largely undeveloped and undrained land between Bandra and Kurla near the infamous Dharavi slum. The Bombay Metropolitan Regional Development Authority (BMRDA) has an ambitious plan for the area: nature parks, commercial complexes, residential colonies, even a bird sanctuary, covering 370 hectares.

The area has been divided into blocks from 'A' to 'I' and the current storm is raging around 'H' block and the 17.93 hectares of its 88 hectares which are supposed to be built up—four hectares of commercial construction with a floor space index (FSI) of two; 4.5 hectares of residential and 9.43 hectares earmarked for the rehabilitation of Dharavi slum dwellers of 1.5 FSI. What the state Government has done is to go ahead and sell off 23 hectares (1 hectare = 10,000 sq m) for Rs 10.73 crore to a single builder for commercial construction and housing.

Only the BMRDA can authorise a change of land use and it is in fact the state Government's rather lame contention that the BMRDA is the villain of the piece. The BMRDA Commissioner, A.N. Batbyal, has been transferred to Aurangabad. However, a careful reading of the events which led up to the sale makes it clear that the top brass of the Government—and they include the then chief minister Vasantrao Patil—seemed to have okayed the deal.

The story begins with an advertisement in he Times of India dated March 2, 1985, inviting tenders for 23,000 sq m of land. By a curious coincidence, March 2 was one of Maharashtra's busy days for that was when the city and part of the state went to the polls for the assembly elections. Four bids were received and the hammer went down in favour of the highest bidder two months later on May 10. The Government has been coy about revealing just who this builder is, but Ram Manohar Tripathi, urban development minister, said in a reply to an insistent questioner that it was Kaveri Construction, although he did not divulge the names of the owners or partners of the concern. Subsequent inquiries have revealed that the firm is owned by the powerful Rahejas.

Map by B.K. SHARMA

> "In central Bombay, 23,000 sq m of land, had been sold off to a single builder by the Government of Maharashtra in unseemly haste."

The Government says that it was the BMRDA which authorised the change of land use but that is only part of the story. The BMRDA is run by a committee of 17 persons with its ex-officio chairman as the chief minister, in this case Vasantrao Patil. The others present, besides Batbyal and Tripathi, on May 10, the day the decision to accept the bid was taken, were Housing Minister V. Subramaniam, Chief Secretary B.D. Deshmukh, Urban Development Secretary N.R. Ranganathan, N.S. Tinaikar, housing Secretary, Ram Mahadik, chairman of the City and Industrial Development Corporation and Bombay Municipal Commissioner J.M. Kanga. In other words, as many as eight committee members were not party to the decision.

Mayor Chhagan Bhujbal, elected a few days earlier, wasn't invited. The chairman of the Bombay Municipal Corporation's standing committee had not been elected, neither had the three municipal councillors, the two Bombay MLA's or the single MLC. In effect, it was entirely an administrative decision and taken in an unusual way: by a memo. According to informed sources there was no meeting at all! A note was merely passed around that it had been decided to allot the land to Kaveri Construction and that was that. Although none of the persons involved in the affair is talking, INDIA TODAY learns that the officials were reluctant to initial the order and the strongest opposition came from Deshmukh and Tinaikar. Kanga even said that the chief minister had no business to permit such a change in the plot use without consulting the corporation even though the BMRDA had exclusive jurisdiction over the land.

Taking all things into account, the deal, if it goes through, is a very good one for the builder, who stands to make a Rs-6 crore profit. "What is worse," says Nayak, "is that selling off one portion of an area marked for planned development could lead to a situation where we get a chain reaction and another Nariman Point." There is considerable opposition within the Congress(I) to the deal and last fortnight, Bombay MP Gurudas Kamat—who belongs to the anti-Vasantdada faction—came out with a demand for a judicial enquiry.

Meanwhile, Tripathi argued in the Assembly that all the criticism was premature as the sale had not yet been complete. That could be only a technicality, as the builder has already paid the deposit. However, the minister did say that until an independent enquiry established what was what, the status quo would be maintained. It does seem though that this is one case where the Government is not going to get its way.

The most envied colour TV within a stone's throw!

Now who'd want to hurl a stone at such a beautiful TV! Mentally, though, many might.

Some of your neighbours for instance. Who may have seen your new ONIDA colour television set. And envied its classy, futuristic looks. And the most astounding true-to-life colour they've ever seen on a TV screen! And have been deeply regretting the fact that they're stuck with colour TVs that are obviously a generation behind!

You may of course argue, your neighbours are the nicest lot. Such violent emotions would never cloud their noble minds no matter how much they envy your ONIDA TV. Well ... lucky you!

HIMACHAL

It's spring time in Lahaul

Once you have crossed the Rohtang pass, having made Manali your starting point, everything is lush and green with flowery meadows flanking your drive on either side. A real visual feast. And if you care to stop and take a look, you will come across some rare varieties also.

Once in Keylong, take a walk up to the famous Khardang Gompa, one of the important Buddhist Gompa's in the land. It is ancient. And it is magnificient. You will admire the Tankhas. One of them displays the penances of the famous Buddhist Saint Milerapa. Thirty kilometres from Keylong and connected by a motorable road are the much revered Hindu shrines of Trilokinath and Udaipur.

For trekkers, Lahaul, to put it mildly, is a virtual paradise. The trek from Chatru to Baralacha via Chandratal is among the more popular treks of Himachal. At Chandratal the view of the Mulkila range is exotic. While at Batal you will be wonderstruck by the panoramic view of the Greater Himalayas including the ten kilometre wide Bara Shigri glacier.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Back to School

LIFE begins rather early in the morning at N.T.Rama Rao's Shanti Kuteeram. The scene in the ashram's backyard, the Telugu Desam headquarters, is very much like a boarding-school with party MLA's standing in neat little rows for a flag salute, followed by a march to their 'classrooms', where they respond to the 'roll-call' with a resounding "Jai Telugu Desam", chanted with a raised right fist. Once in the classrooms, the trainees go through a day-long gruel of lectures, debates and discussions in which they are educated on the three-and-a-half-year-old party's birth, history and relevance, the Andhra culture and the Telugu ethos and the mechanics of running an effective party machinery.

The curriculum includes newspaper-reading sessions at the end of which the trainees are told to draft rejoinders and letters to the editors explaining the party's stand. For the week or so of their training, the legislators, in batches of 100, have to stay in corrugated-roof sheds, wear badges carrying NTR's picture, watch his films at night and refer to him only as "Annagaru". Also, they cannot leave the campus without the batch coordinator's permission, not even for a smoke, which is taboo there anyway.

For the party legislators, it is not back to school for nothing. Their exercise is only the latest in a series of such training camps held for 400 new entrants since the March assembly elections. Devised by NTR's son-in-law and the party's virtual second-in-command, N. Chandrababu Naidu, its ostensible aim is to raise obedient and orderly party ranks which would give the Telugu Desam a more reliable base than just NTR's charisma. Declares Naidu: "All this training is for loyal, determined and disciplined cadres to purify the country's politics. The country needs value-based politics and we want other parties to learn from us and improve on what we have done to introduce fresh and clean politics."

Naidu's words, however, are just so much high-sounding prose. Evidently the entire exercise is aimed at preparing grassroots public relations workers for NTR to keep the people on his side. The material given to the trainees itself testifies to this. In the seven-page document listing the duties of a party worker, for instance, is a comparison of NTR with Mahatma Gandhi. Says the directive: "Annagaru should be revered as Gandhi was respected during the freedom struggle. We have to learn from him." It was NTR himself who had first made this comparison during a conversation with journalists. "If the Congress can survive after Gandhi, the Telugu Desam can live after NTR," he had declared. Whether or not NTR wants to be referred to as the "Andhra Gandhi", he has made sure that all literature given to the trainees mentions him only as "Annagaru", a name coined ironically at the time of the party's formation by Nadendla Bhaskara Rao, who broke away from NTR last August.

The do's and don'ts for active members include wearing saffron shirts and saris on special occasions, displaying the party flag atop houses and vehicles and generally "giving the impression that all work they do is a public service in the name of the party". An example given is of the inauguration of a well by a local MLA or some prominent party leader. The party members, the directive says, should invite the local party leader and "ask him to give the first pitcher of water to the people and extol Anna's programmes". Another curious directive is to reserve a prominent wall space in the area by whitewashing it to display the party candidate's name when it is announced.

Clearly these orders are directed towards the next elections to the panchayat mandals which will replace the panchayat samitis in the state's new system of rural administration. Since the panchayat samitis term does not expire until next year, the directives are perhaps also an indication of early mandal elections.

All the same, the training programme is not clear on what is described as the party ideology. NTR is characteristically vague on the issue: "You cannot get any ideology from the dusty books in a library. If you have eyes to see and ears to hear, you can discover our ideology in the hungry faces of the poor. Our ideology is to work for providing food, shelter and clothing to the country's poor." Tummalla Choudhary, an ex-Lok Dal activist and now a member of Telugu Desam's Central Election Committee, who is also one of the instructors at the training camp, is equally vague and high-flown: "We have specific views on different issues. We do not believe society will change in a particular way but accept suitable doctrines. Both capitalism and Marxism are unacceptable to us." Minte Padmanabham, another instructor at the training camp, perhaps comes a little close to the point when he says, "NTR's speeches, resolutions adopted at party conventions and election manifestos add up to form the party ideology."

The muddled thinking about the party's goals is due to the absence of a proper think-tank and NTR's whims about personal propaganda. Naidu is assisted by a coterie of former Lok Dal activists like Choudhary and Padmanab-ham who supervise the effective personal publicity of NTR through badges and film screenings at the training camp. It is a measure of the party's confusion on basics that the new members seem to be as uncertain about their reasons for joining the party as they are about the party's policies and programmes. Said Nirmala Sumathi Reddy, a young activist from Adilabad: "I joined the party because Annagaru has shown many ways to help the poor in the villages." Satyavathi Rathod, a Lambada tribal from Warangal, also voiced similar hero-worship: "He has taken up many programmes for the poor. It is not his fault if those in charge of implementing them are inefficient or corrupt."

Naidu, or "Babugaru" as he is known, himself sits in at most of the training sessions and calls each trainee by name. Evidently he is spending his time at these camps to develop a personal rapport with organised tiers of district and local-level party leadership as many of the trained activists are likely to be in the running for the mandal elections. Though primary membership to the party was formally closed on June 30, with Naidu claiming a more than 30 lakh enrolment, another special drive is being launched to induct more women members. Considering the muddle-headedness of the new members, the training camps can prove useful for only one thing: to organise bands of NTR loyalists who are convinced he can never go wrong. And in that, both "Annagaru" and "Babugaru" have so far been successful.

RAJASTHAN

Post-mortem

THE GHOST of the late Man Singh, independent MLA from Deeg and scion of the erstwhile ruling family of the state, continues to haunt the Congress(I). Last fortnight the entire Opposition walked out of the Rajasthan Vidhan Sabha in protest against what it called the state Government's attempts to shield the two main accused in the case: Deputy Superintendent of police Kansingh Bhati and Deeg Station House Officer Veerendra Singh. The Opposition was miffed because bail was granted to the two policemen, when the usual procedure in cases of this nature is to keep the accused in custody lest they try and influence witnesses. The state Government and the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) added to the uproar by accusing each other of botching up the case.

Man Singh: ghost haunts

Under the law, Bhati and Singh could have been held in custody for only 90 days pending the CBI investigations. The agency's failure to file a challan in court by the end of this period, which ended on July 4, automatically entitled the two police officers to get bail. The investigation report was actually handed over to the state Government on June 29, five days before the expiry of the 90-day deadline. What was needed was the Government's sanction to prosecute; Section 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code lays down that no government employee accused of committing a crime in the course of his official duties may be prosecuted without the sanction of the Government. The clause exists to protect government employees from harassment for doing their duty.

AMOLAK PATNI

Bhati: bailed out

The CBI alleges that the Government deliberately delayed giving sanction for prosecution so that Bhati and Singh would be free on bail. Says a source in the organisation: "If the state Government was serious about giving sanction to prosecute on time, they could have easily done it. But instead of hastening the process by talking it out across the table, they chose to start a written correspondence deliberately. The state Government's attitude is undoubtedly fishy." After coming under attack in the Vidhan Sabha, the Government said it sent a letter to the CBI on July 3 saying it was unable to grant permission unless all the necessary papers were submitted to it. Though it received a written reply the same day, the Government claims several of its queries remained unanswered.

"I cannot understand why the CBI and the state Government officials could not sit down together and sort out their problems. Why the matter was left till the last moment is not clear," says Bhairon Singh Shekhawat, leader of the Opposition. Adds Lok Dal state unit President Nathuram Mirdha: "It is unfortunate that greater caution was not exercised in the handling of a case as sensitive as this one." The Government sticks to its stand that it will grant sanction to prosecute only after all the documents it has asked for are received. And that is where the matter rests for the time being.

The CBI had originally come into the picture following opposition charges that high-ups in the state Government were involved in Man Singh's killing. Apparently following provocation from Congress(I) workers, Man Singh had smashed a podium erected for a ruling party meeting and then dashed his jeep against a helicopter used by the then chief minister Shiv Charan Mathur for his election campaign. A police party led by Bhati which had gone to Deeg to arrest Man Singh on February 21 had ended up killing him and two of his supporters in the gun-fight that allegedly ensued. The police version had been that Man Singh had tried to escape, while the general belief was that he was shot in cold blood. Coming as it did so close before the assembly elections, the incident so embarrassed the ruling party that Mathur ended up handing in his resignation to appease an enraged and shocked electorate.

Man Singh's son-in-law, Vijai Singh had filed a private complaint that his father-in-law had been killed as a result of a criminal conspiracy which involved senior people in the Government. The CBI investigated this allegation and at one stage the state capital of Jaipur was agog with rumours that some big names might be implicated in the killing. But Vijai Singh's allegation could not be established and the charge has been dropped. None of the accused is high up in the Government, either. After investigations lasting 85 days, the CBI finally sought the state Government's permission to prosecute 18 police personnel for murder, besides other charges.

The state Government seems to be influenced by reports of resentment in the police force over the prosecution of so many policemen under public pressure—a feeling that in a time of crisis the Government has not stood by its employees. A senior police official points out that such large-scale prosecution on such a serious charge could deter policemen from decisive steps on the spot in future. Chief Minister Harideo Joshi said on the floor of the House that the Government was not convinced that all 18 police personnel should face a charge of murder. Only one realisation emerges from the whole unpleasant scenario: Bhati and Singh would have still been in jail had there been a little better coordination between the Government and the CBI. And this is what has incensed the Opposition.

BUREAUCRACY

Party Blues

MORE than six months after the guests left and the leftovers were thrown away, a party that a top Rajasthan bureaucrat hosted shows signs of leaving a bad taste in his mouth. State Chief Secretary Anand Mohan Lal could have hardly foreseen the row it would create when he held his dinner do on December 19 last year. As the Opposition went hammer and tongs at Chief Minister Harideo Joshi over the issue last fortnight, the morning six months after the night before not only became unpleasant, it threatened to turn into a nasty, if delayed, hangover. The Opposition charged in the Vidhan Sabha that Lal had misused government money and machinery to hold the party and asked the chief minister why no action had been taken against him.

The chief secretary's bash of last year would still not have come to light had it not been for the state's largest circulated daily, Rajasthan Patrika, which carried an article on the "lavish" affair in one of its Sunday supplements last month. Said journalist Milap Chand Dandiya, the author of the story: "I deliberately held back the article for so many months. If it had appeared earlier, they would have covered up the facts. I wanted to be sure that all accounting entries had been made in the Government books." Which is why the Opposition's attack on July 8, though belated, did not lack firepower.

Led by leader of the Opposition Bhairon Singh Shekhawat of the BJP, members faulted Lal on several counts. Further excitement was provided by the fact that the dinner had been attended by various luminaries of Jaipur, among them the state's Governor, O.P.Mehra. In the first place, they alleged that Lal had violated the law by inviting more than 250 people. They pointed to the food control order, now generally ignored, which prohibits the serving of cereals to more than 100 persons on a single occasion. They also objected to Lal's serving drinks in public and expressed disappointment at the governor joining in.

But these were mild charges compared to the ones that followed. Shekhawat said that vehicles of the election department had been misused for organising the dinner. The Public Works Department, he alleged, had chipped in by getting four road rollers from faraway places to fix the road in front of Lal's residence on a priority basis. But the most serious charges related to the tourism department. Food, it was alleged, had been supplied free by a state government hotel, and a cultural troupe had been hired by the tourism directorate at its expense to entertain Lal's guests.

RAJASTHAN PATRIKA

Lal (centre) at his party

Joshi's reply in the Assembly was peculiarly lacklustre and his defence of the chief secretary was weak. Shekhawat wrote to Joshi soon after the article came out but he says he got a dissatisfactory two-line reply from the chief minister. Joshi, on his part, told the Assembly that he had asked for Lal's comments soon after the article appeared but did not get a reply for nearly a month. That Joshi tolerated this delay is quite surprising.

The 54-year-old chief secretary, who has been in office for 17 months, refused when contacted to comment on the whole affair. He only said: "I am accused of having hosted the dinner on my 25th wedding anniversary. Firstly, I was married in October and not in December. And secondly, I have been married only 18 years, not 25."

Director of Tourism K.L. Meena, who is also director of the Rajasthan Tourism Development Corporation (RTDC), comes up with a long explanation for his organisation's involvement in the controversy. To attract tourists, he said, the department has been hiring cultural troupes to perform at 13 fairs and festivals all over the state, including the well-known Pushkar and Jaisalmer melas. Instead of repeating the same performance year after year, it had decided to introduce a new show depicting the different wedding ceremonies in Rajasthan, he said. Since the chief secretary was deeply involved in most programmes, it was decided to hold the new item's dress rehearsal in his presence so that he could give his comments, says Meena. The department paid Rs 5,600 to the 74-member troupe. And it was this most of all that invited criticism: the payment of government money to entertain Lal's personal guests. Meena also denies that the food was supplied by a government hotel and claims that only some waiters had been called from the Khasa Kothi hotel. But this was after duty hours and Lal had remunerated them, he says. Some food stuff supplied by Lal was cooked by the hotel staff at his residence and also at the hotel. But the bulk of it came from a private caterer, he adds. Whatever the truth, it has given the state Government plenty of food for thought.

Kirloskarvadi

It is from this wellspring that India's largest range of pumps and valves originate, meeting fluid handling requirements of almost every industry.

For handling 70% urea solution, at the fertiliser plant, Project Development India Ltd., Sindri, entrusted Kirloskar Brothers Limited (KBL) with the designing and building of vertical sump pumps. These pumps with all critical and wetted parts in stainless steel grade CF6M are provided with a steam jacket to prevent urea from crystallization.

For liquid petroleum gas bottling stations, of the Indian Oil Corporation Ltd, KBL developed high pressure, high efficiency multistage pumps. After trials more than 30 pumps have been supplied and are working without any problem. Recently, Hindustan Petroleum Corporation placed orders on KBL for pumps for similar LPG applications.

Only after carrying out strict endurance tests, first by KBL then by Engineers India Ltd. and Bharat Heavy Electricals, were the specially developed vertical sump pumps supplied to BHEL, for handling lubricating oil for turbine bearings. These import substitutes are expected to save the nation a considerable chunk of foreign exchange.

It is this engineering strength that has earned KBL the position of the leader in fluid handling. And it is innovative stamina that will keep it ahead.

ORISSA

The Agony of Kalahandi

HERE is a picture of hell: there is no food and no water. For 20 long and agonising years, no one has come to help. Those whose limbs still work have left the villages, never to return. Those who've been unable to get away are dead or dying. They move in groups, licking water, like dogs. For food, they pick the poisonous roots and leaves—the only thing that will grow there—and boil them for three whole days before they can eat them. Those who have been able to find jobs earn from 75 paise to a princely Rs 3.50 a day! Two out of every three children born die in infancy. There is fever, cholera, dysentery and an ever-increasing number of respiratory diseases.

Nothing could be worse, no people more wretched. But in the once princely district of Kalahandi in Orissa, there is something much worse: women have now begun to abandon and sell their children because they can no longer afford to feed them. Principal Correspondent FARZAND AHMED travelled extensively over the suffering land to see the people that god and man forgot. His report:

Photographs by PRASANTA PATNAIK

PANASI Punji, 35, of Amlapalli village in Khariar block was abandoned by her husband two years ago. This year she abandoned her husband's little sister Vanita. "My own two children were starving," she said, "what could I do?" In Boden block, Rama Gahir picked up her three-day-old child and walked 25 km to Khariar to leave the tiny new-born baby at a Christian mission. On the way she sold it for Rs 80 and two saris. In a hospital in Khariar, another starving woman abandoned her male child, Jatin Kumar. Said Kapil Narain Tiwary, a former MLA: "Here children are sold cheaper than channas and the Government instead of rescuing the poor from hunger was pressurising them to deny the sale stories."

For Janaki Ballav Patnaik, the chief minister of Orissa, the tragedy of Kalahandi is a big slap in the face. Exactly five years ago, the journalist-turned-politician had promised life and good fortune to his state. He had pledged to "turn Orissa into an island of prosperity and bring at least half a million of the poorest of the poor people above the poverty line in five years."

It didn't happen. Five years later, Kalahandi, with a population of 13.39 lakh, is still the poorest of the poor, a dark diseased corner where civilisation has left none of its benefits. Its tragedy started in 1965 when the rains failed. The villagers waited and prayed for water but for 20 years the heavens have been unkind. The iron grip of drought and famine hardened resulting in the worst ever hunger and starvation. "Since then the drought has not loosened its grip," said 28-year-old Khariar block Chairman Madhusudan Das "people are starving and most of the able-bodied persons have migrated to neighbouring Raipur in Madhya Pradesh and other towns to eke out a living by pulling rickshaws or to work as labourers. Since all are poor none can help anyone else." Das pointed out that of the 109 villages in the Khariar block, 107 are suffering from acute drought, with a 75 per cent crop loss. "Most of the people here are half dead, some just breathing skeletons," said Block Development Officer Ganga Dhar Patra.

But if nature has been cruel, so has the Government. Tiwary made an extensive survey of the area in May when the sun was at its unkindest. His report, submitted to the district administration, was quite startling: all the people from 16 villages under the Bhaisadani panchayat had shifted to a nearby hill during the summer because that was the only place they could find roots and leaves, often poisonous, but the only thing left to eat in the area. Dhubai village, nearby, was completely deserted because there was no drinking water facility during the summer. And Chooipan Boipan village, Tiwary described as a no man's land. Additional District Magistrate Lalit Mohan Padihari was forced to admit that a "distress situation" had completely overtaken the entire district.

Still no one came to quench the villagers' thirst. Again and again, even in the direst of emergencies, officials have failed Kalahandi. Whatever the Government's assertions about development, local leaders claim that the reality is far, far from it. No one knows what prosperity means and compared to other districts of coastal Orissa, Kalahandi is especially pathetic. Officials argue that rainfall here is always below normal and as a result the food production has remained a static 8.98 quintals per hectare against the state's average of 11.38 quintals. This may be a logical argument, but hardly the kind that will help the starving masses.

"Children are sold cheaper than channas and the Government instead of rescuing is pressurising them to deny the sale stories."

Aid has come in little bits and pieces. According to official figures, the administration could spend only Rs 87.03 lakh out of the Rs 166.03 lakh allotted under the National Rural Employment Programme and Rs 69.36 lakh out of Rs 127.46 lakh meant for Rural Labour Employment Guarantee Programme during 1984-85. Finally, last month, as hunger and thirst reached a new low, 150 people from Boden and Khariar—guided by the Sangathan, an Oxfam-aided voluntary organisation—trekked 80 km, all the way to district headquarters in Bhawanipatna, spending 17 days en route, to show the district magistrate their pathetic condition. At first the officials refused to see the marchers but as their condition deteriorated, they relented and promised an emergency feeding programme beginning July 1 that would cover 3,400 people in the worst drought-hit areas of the district.

The additional district magistrate told INDIA TODAY that already 1.68 lakh people including children, expectant and nursing mothers were covered under a normal feeding programme, but as often happens, those who needed it most were not even aware of the existence of such a programme. And last month's sudden desertion of children, if anything, proved that if such a programme did indeed exist, it certainly had not been implemented in the interiors for months. Rama Gahir abandoned her three-day-old child because she had no milk to feed him and nothing to feed herself.

To make matters worse, the entire cooperative financing service has also collapsed in the area. No government loans are now available to farmers since all have been declared defaulters. Kalahandi Central Cooperative Bank Secretary Rabindra Kumar Patnaik explained that this was so because recovery was extremely poor, the lowest in the country since most farmers had lost their paying capacity. As a result of the virtual non-recovery of loans, the National Bank for Agriculture and Rural Development had stopped its assistance. In 1980-81, Rs 327.22 lakh had been advanced as loans to farmers. This year no loan has been given at all.

of distress. The administration in Bhubaneswar issued a lengthy press note terming any such reports as exaggerated. "Such news items defame our society and our state," said Chief Minister Patnaik.

The chief minister insisted that his government had taken special measures because of the distress situation in the district and as a result it was able to prevent a repetition of 1965-66 when large-scale starvation deaths had taken place. "My government has taken up Kalahandi as a big challenge," he said loftily as he talked of expensive roads that had been constructed and the nearly 400 school buildings that had been made. According to him the real solution lay in the creation of irrigation facilities and the Government would launch the Rs 90-crore Indira Project which would change the socio-economic composition of the district. In 1981, Patnaik had laid the foundation-stones of four big industries. But none has come up so far.

Most people have begun to believe that the real problem of Kalahandi is that it has no political clout. That is why it has suffered while other districts have thrived. According to Bhupendra Singh, MLA and government deputy chief whip, the local people had to battle for a long time to get a bridge over the river Tel which had been washed away in the 1967 floods. It was given the go-ahead only in 1981, 14 years later. On the other hand, as opposition leaders point out, politically powerful Cuttack has got everything out of proportion. A Rs 19-crore embankment around Cuttack is under construction to save the town from the floods of the Mahanadi.

The villagers have waited and prayed for water but for 20 years the heavens have been unkind. But if nature has been cruel, so has the Government.

Similarly the Tirtol-Kolar road bridge was completed at a cost of Rs 3.37 crore to benefit only three panchayats including that of one-time political strongman Basant Kumar Biswal's uncle. Last year, Chief Minister Patnaik, in a bid to pacify his angry wife Jayanti, MP, and Biswal who had fallen out over the location of a bridge on the river Luna, sanctioned two bridges at Punbasa and Nuapara, each costing Rs 3 crore.

Even in drinking water, Kalahandi has been denied its due. The Government has spent Rs 98 crore in five years claiming that 67,000 tubewells had been sunk in the state—but water has not come to Kalahandi. The miseries of the people don't end there. There is no longer any hope in the area, only disease. The long famine has given the population its special gifts—fever, cholera, dysentery, diarrhoea, respiratory diseases. Here the infant mortality rate is the highest. According to the District Statistical Handbook (1979-80), the number of births averaged 1,600 to 18,000 per year and the number of deaths between 9,000 and 12,000. The Government continues to maintain that the district is free from starvation deaths.

However, hunger and disease is not new to Kalahandi. "In fact," said Bhupendra Singh, "the district has frequently been struck by drought or famine for long periods." There have been severe famines in 1897, 1902 and 1919, 1930. Food and water are something the villagers have learnt to live without—till the drought which has just about broken their backbone.

The rich have remained largely unaffected but the poor have become the wretched of the earth. In a country where the slave system has apparently been abolished, the poor of these drought-hit areas continue to live as slaves. Most parents mortgage the hands of their little children to pay off their debts. The children then grow into bonded slaves, tied to their rich masters for life. An official publication in Oriya, however, claims that under the IRDP, a vast number of families have been rehabilitated. In 1980-81, 5,694 families were rehabilitated, in 1981-82, 7,969 families, in 1982-83, 15,573 and in 1983-84, 10,800 families.

The figures fool no one but the Government. Kalahandi is an area that the Patnaik administration would like to believe doesn't exist. Its reality is a shameful story. If 150 bonded slaves could walk for 17 days to Bhawanipatna last month, demanding their emancipation, if women have reached the stage where they must sell their children to survive, then surely the villagers have been denied their most basic fundamental rights in a free country—the right to food, water and liberty.

Voltas capability

Voltas has the kind of capability that is backed by sophisticated manufacturing facilities and quality control techniques. Up-dated continuously. Three divisions, four manufacturing units and one subsidiary unit have a power house of 200 engineers and 1800 support personnel.

Capability that has been further attested by a prestigious order from the Panipat Thermal Plant. Over 1000 panels to be engineered, supplied and installed by Voltas for India's largest on-going project, the Vizag Steel Plant. Voltas will supply the entire range of medium and low voltage panels for power distribution, including complete projects for 36 unit-type substations.

Acceptance by India's leading consultants, Engineers India Ltd. for ONGC's Hazira-Jagdishpur pipeline is yet another acknowledgement of Voltas capability. 100 power and motor control centres from Voltas will be used in this pipeline which will carry natural gas from Bombay High.

And Voltas has the kind of commitment that starts at the top. A management attitude that filters down, creating the ability to meet the most exacting challenges.

Backed by Voltas technology that does not rely on the hand-me-down expertise of just one collaborator. Voltas draws directly from the world's leaders. Like Merlin Gerin, Research Cottrell, May & Christe, and Ames Crosta Babcock.

Our capability, technology and commitment back any project we undertake. With one goal before us.

Your confidence is our most important goal.

Solanki garlands successor Chaudhuri: changing of the guard

GUJARAT

An Uncertain Legacy

THREE days after he quit office, Madhavsinh Solanki was helping his wife pack their personal effects. He was vacating a house he had occupied for a little over five years and among the many possessions that had grown in these years were books: some 3,000 of them on various subjects ranging from philosophy to natural history. Greeting visitors with his charismatic smile and hiding his hurt behind his usual charm, Solanki did not hide his relief at being divested of all responsibility. As he said: "Now I will have all the time in the world to go back to my books, my first and last love. At 57, the best thing I can do is to pick up on my reading."

If that sounded like a man on the verge of retirement, it couldn't have struck a most unconvincing note. Obviously, Gujarat was happy to see him go. He had done enough damage in the 118 days he had been in power in his second term. But it was difficult to see Solanki bowing out of its affairs just like that politicians don't, and in any case he seemed to have ensured his continuing influence in the choice of his successor, Amarsinh Chaudhuri, who was seen as his nominee. The task of bringing peace and restoring normalcy would be daunting for the tallest of leaders and the man chosen to succeed Solanki—Amarsinh Chaudhuri—did not inspire much confidence. Soon after being sworn in, he moved to establish his authority by dropping several ministers and switching around top bureaucrats but the anti-reservationists refused to call off their agitation and peace was not yet at hand.

Most significant of all, the wily Solanki, a professed champion of the backward castes, was seen to have outsmarted the party high command, which had sent down some half a dozen observers to supervise the switch-over. The observers, it was said, had left Delhi with the objective of installing Natwarlal Shah, the non-controversial high caste speaker, in Solanki's place but had to settle on Chaudhuri in the face of strong pressure from the MLA's who are mostly Solanki's men. After the backtracking that Vasantrao Patil was seen to have compelled the high command to do last month in Maharashtra, the Gujarat episode seemed to provide further confirmation that, as one dissident Gujarat politician said "those who appear to be strong are not really that strong".

The party leadership certainly did not seem irresolute at the beginning of the whole drama. Solanki met Rajiv Gandhi on June 20 and was reportedly given a fortnight to set matters right. The deadline expired on July 5 and the same day the countdown started for Solanki's exit. He had come to Delhi three days ago for a conference on overdrafts with Finance Minister V.P. Singh and was asked to delay his departure. The press had been speculating his exit but after Solanki presented the state's budget earlier in the week, the media too seemed convinced that nothing would happen till the budget session concluded in late July. With minimum publicity the high command had already initiated the process of change-over.

Late on the evening of July 4, two AICC(I) observers, Santosh Mohan Deb and Amarjit Kaur, caught the flight to Ahmedabad. Their presence in the troubled city went unnoticed until, next morning, they began summoning legislators from Gandhinagar, 25 km away, where the Assembly was in session, and asking them leading questions which left nobody in doubt that their mission was to initiate the change of guard. Meanwhile, Solanki met Rajiv Gandhi twice in Delhi. The decision was apparently conveyed at these meetings for thereafter no time was lost. Union Finance Minister Singh, AICC(I) general secretaries G.K. Moopanar and Chandulal Chandrakar, and Solanki left for Gujarat in a special aircraft the same evening.

By the time the senior party observers got there, Deb and Kaur had already spoken to an overwhelming majority of the Congress(I) legislators: 92 out of 149. They spent much of their time the next day talking to dissident Congress(I) men like Jinabhai Darji, Sanat Mehta and Manoharsinh Jadeja. The meeting of the legislature party was scheduled for 4 p.m. but was delayed by 35 minutes. There was a last-minute call from Delhi which delayed the meeting further. The meeting itself was over in a jiffy: Solanki proposed Chaudhuri's name; Mahant Vijaydasji, PCC(I) president, seconded it and the house passed the motion with nary a dissenting voice. As Moopanar later said: "We spoke to all the legislators and found that Chaudhuri was their unanimous choice."

That was not quite correct. Another of the observers revealed that Darji and the other dissidents were firm in their view that Shah should be selected. They pointed out that not merely was Chaudhuri identified too closely with Solanki in the public mind, he was also discredited as the home minister who did little to arrest the near anarchy in the state. They argued that it was imperative that peace be restored to the state and since Shah was a high-caste he could be relied upon to persuade the anti-reservationists to call off their agitation.

The irony of the situation was not lost on political observers. Darji, a tribal himself, had persuaded Chaudhuri to enter politics many years ago and was for long his mentor. Five years ago Darji and Mehta had implemented their well-known KHAM (Kshatriyas, Harijans, Adivasis and Muslims) theory which created such a secure vote bank for the party that it swept the next two polls. And, now, when the legislators were showing a preference for an Adivasi, they were pleading the case of a high-caste Hindu because Chaudhuri is said to be a Solanki man.

The party high command professed to be very satisfied with the ultimate choice. INDIA TODAY learnt that Chaudhuri was certainly on the high command's short list. One of the main protagonists for Chaudhuri was P. Shivshankar, Rajya Sabha member from Gujarat, and member of the five-strong delegation sent by the party high command to assess Solanki last month. A senior leader from Gujarat, who is known to be no great admirer of either Solanki or Chaudhuri, revealed that Shivshankar spent one-and-a-half hours trying to persuade him that Chaudhuri would be the best man to take over from Solanki.

Several reasons were advanced in Chaudhuri's favour. Choosing a high-caste man would have been tantamount to setting the clock back in a state where the alignment of social classes and castes had definitely shifted in favour of the backwards. Solanki, a Kshatriya, had been a little too aggressive in pushing the backwards' interests and had ended up antagonising the high-castes but there was no denying that his efforts had raised the political consciousness of the backwards, especially within the Congress(I) ranks. They could not be expected to take kindly to power being restored to the Patels and the Patidars. And as V.P. Singh said: "We could not accept a situation where partymen will constantly be squabbling within themselves."

Nor did the party leadership think that Chaudhuri could be held jointly responsible for Solanki's sins. He certainly was the home minister under Solanki but everybody knew that the chief minister was calling the shots, reportedly with a little bit of help from his old friend and former home minister, Prabodh Raval. Also, as Moopanar explained: "We must not forget that Chaudhuri was never the target of the agitation."

The Congress(I) was also not unaware of the propaganda fallout of the selection of Chaudhuri as the first tribal chief minister of Gujarat. Doordarshan was quick to highlight that his appointment marked part fulfillment of Mrs Gandhi's dream to uplift the Adivasis. Party propagandists went around Delhi pointing out that Mrs Gandhi had spoken about this "dream" even in her by now famous last speech in Orissa where she had talked about giving her last drop of blood for the nation.

There was little doubt, however, that Chaudhuri's choice had come as a surprise, even to Chaudhuri himself (see interview). Natwarlal Shah was considered the front runner in the leadership stakes ever since doubts surfaced in mid-June about Solanki's future. A sober and experienced leader, he has both the attributes greatly valued by the high command: a clean image and a non-controversial past. In the last five years, the Gujarat unit of the Congress (I) has been plagued by intense factional infighting but Shah kept himself above factionalism. His bungalow in Gandhinagar is ordinarily one of the least crowded but for several days before Solanki actually quit, it saw an unusual flurry of activity with cars streaming in and out carrying MLA's and MP's.

According to one report, the dissidents' arguments in favour of Shah were so persuasive that the observers tried to convince Solanki to accept Shah. As the speaker, he is ordinarily not invited to meetings of the Congress(I) legislature party but he was asked to be available while the party met. It seemed a foregone conclusion that Shah would be anointed —even in the Gujarat Bhavan in New Delhi the betting was in his favour. His non-selection came as a big surprise but Moopanar, who hardly ever seems surprised at anything, dismissed all the media hype about Shah with the disarming poser: "If the vast majority of the MLA's had tipped him, wouldn't he have been made the chief minister?"

Solanki, it was learnt, had proposed three names for his successor: Revenue Minister Harisinh Mahida, GPCC(I) President Mahant Vijaydasji and Chaudhuri. When the observers urged him to accept Shah, he is understood to have argued that they should choose from among the three because that was the view of the majority of the MLA's. While it was widely believed that the selection of Chaudhuri amounted to a capitulation by the high command, there reason to believe that Solanki would have preferred Mahida or Vijaydasji. INDIA TODAY learned that he plumped for Chaudhuri when he saw that the high command observers were very keen on Shah and would not compromise on any other of his three nominees.

The Congress(I) leadership was keen to show that Chaudhuri's choice was based solely on the preferences of the MLA's. One newspaper report had claimed that the long-distance call that had delayed the meeting was, in fact, made by Singh to Rajiv—with Solanki in attendance—to ask him to break the stalemate between Shah and Chaudhuri. Solanki came out beaming after the call, so the deduction was that Rajiv had decided in Chaudhuri's favour. However, both Singh and Moopanar maintain that the call was one that had earlier been booked by Singh's staff and which had happened to materialise then. Moopanar admitted that they had kept Delhi informed of the developments throughout the day and described speculation about the last minute call as "bunkum".

Public reaction to Chaudhuri's selection was mixed. The day before, when word had quickly spread in Ahmedabad that Solanki had been finally asked to go, a festive mood had gripped the city. People came out to dance and crackers were burst, especially in localities where high-castes are predominant. It was widely expected that Shah would take over and this gave an additional lilt to the celebrations. But the same localities —like Naranpura, Navrangpura, Nava Wadaj, Ellisbridge and Ambawadi—fell silent when it was learnt that now an Adivasi chief minister would rule over them. In sharp contrast, in areas largely inhabited by the backward castes, like Dani Limda, Gitamandir Road, Majoor Gaon, Naroda, Rajpur, Rakhial, among others, jubilant people took out processions beating drums, sprinkling gulal and distributing sweets to all.

Chaudhuri himself moved quickly to try and show that he was not a proxy for Solanki. His compact ministry of 10 showed 12 omissions from Solanki's list. Five of the 12 belonged to Solanki's caste and none of them had a reputation for efficiency. Two of the new ministers, Babubhai Sopariwala and Amarsinh Vaghela, are known critics of Solanki. Chaudhuri, who made an airdash to Delhi to consult the high command before announcing his ministry, was categorical that a clean image and efficiency would undoubtedly be his bench-marks.

Chaudhuri also rung in several bureaucratic changes to show that his government meant business. Three secretaries to the Government, including the Chief Secretary, M. Shivagnanam, were transferred. But the appointment that received the widest publicity, and showed that Delhi was putting the new Government through its paces, was the replacement of V.T. Shah as the director-general of police by Julius Francis Ribeiro, the ex-Bombay police commissioner who had recently taken over as the director-

AMARSINH CHAUDHURI

"Violence will be stopped"

FOR AMARSINH Chaudhuri, 44, who became Gujarat's first Adivasi chief minister replacing Madhavsinh Solanki, it has been a struggle to the top. He remembers the days of his childhood when he had to graze cattle every day before going to school. His family in Dolvan village in Surat district owned only about 1.5 acres of land and even basic necessities were difficult to come by. His dream of studying further nearly came to an end after he passed the seventh standard when because of his family's poverty he had to work as the house servant of a landlord.

Not wanting to quit studies, he then started giving tuition to schoolchildren so as to go to secondary school. Later, while studying at the M.S. University in Baroda, he swallowed his pride to borrow used drawing sheets and pencils to do his drawings. At one point he again thought he would have to quit studies as the friends with whom he stayed threw out his baggage one day because he had been unable to pay the rent in time. But there were some kind souls who helped him complete his degree course.

Even as a student he had been interested in politics but had never dreamt he would one day be a politician himself. He had started working as an engineer when Jinabhai Darji, the well-known south Gujarat leader, noticed him and persuaded him to enter politics. He was elected the president of the Vyara taluka Youth Congress (I) in 1971 and four years later was elected to the state Assembly. He was first made a minister in the short-lived Ghanshyam Oza ministry in 1975. When Solanki came to power in 1980, he was made the irrigation minister. In Solanki's second term, he emerged as the most senior minister with the crucial portfolio of home.

His elevation to the top came as a surprise but Chaudhuri sounded confident about tackling the situation when he spoke to Correspondent RAMESH MENON in Gandhinagar soon after he took charge. Excerpts:

Chaudhuri: gearing up

Q. Were you surprised on being elevated as chief minister?

A. It definitely was a surprise. I never thought I would be made a chief minister in the present circumstances.

Q. You have taken over a strife-torn state. How do you feel?

A. It is a very challenging situation and the problems are many and complicated. But I will get around them.

Q. How will you do that?

A. We are planning to take various actions at various levels. There is going to be a major shake-up in the bureaucracy and the police. I have signed some orders today. But what will engage my immediate attention is the restoration of communal peace. There is lot of hatred and tension now. This will have to be eased and hurt feelings soothed. Communal violence will be stopped at any cost.

Q. How will you cool communal passions which are raging through major cities?

A. By showing the people that the Government is above all castes, creeds and communities.

Q. You were not able to control the situation as home minister. How will you be able to do that now?

A. Gujarat's people are very sensitive. Once an agitation starts, it is difficult to stop it. We tried our best to end it. But there were interested parties behind it. I hope it will end now. I plan to take different actions like having talks with agitating government employees.

Q. Do you think that the anti-reservation agitation will end now?

A. It should. The situation has changed now. Moreover, we have conceded nearly all the demands of anti-reservationists and government employees. The people have also started realising this.

Q. Do you plan to change the reservation quota?

A. No changes will be made till a national consensus is reached.

Q. How will you end groupism in the party?

A. That is also one of my prime concerns. I will not hesitate to patch up with different groups, mend relations and ensure that their needs and interests are safeguarded. Once this is done, there is no room for any groupism.

Q. Will you also then patch up with your one-time political mentor, Jinabhai Darji?

A. Yes. I have nothing against him.

Q. You have made drastic changes in the cabinet by dropping 12 members of the Solanki cabinet. Why did you change practically the whole team?

A. I kept efficiency and a clean image in mind when forming my new team. The changes are part of my plan for a clean, efficient government. I want these ministers to bring in a fresh, new image.

Q. You have made some changes at the top of the bureaucratic set-up. Why did you make these sudden, drastic changes?

A. These changes are expected to streamline and gear up the administration.

Q. In recent years, Gujarat politics has taken on a casteist colour with the KHAM (Kshatriya, Harijan, Adivasi and Muslim) theory creating a vote bank for the Congress(I). Will you continue to use this strategy?

A. No, I am against any politics of this sort. Interests of different groups and communities must be safeguarded. But they should never be exploited for political ends. One should not pander to them just to get votes.

Q. Since caste has become such a major force in Gujarat politics, do you think that your being an Adivasi puts you at a disadvantage?

A. I do not feel that it will. This kind of feeling may come about if I am biased towards certain communities. I will see that this does not happen. As the chief minister, all communities are equally important to me.

Q. You were very close to Solanki. He used to guide you. Will you continue to look up to him for advice and help?

A. Now, I am on my own. I will help and guide myself.

general of the CRPF. The affable and tough Ribeiro, whose openness with the media came as a welcome departure from the past, has his job cut out for him in restoring self-confidence among the policemen and credibility with the people. He showed that he had his priorities right. He was, he said, not in favour of the army doing the police's job but as long as the army's presence was felt necessary it was his "job to ensure coordination" between the two. He also gave notice that he would not hesitate to take harsh steps to control violence. "It is imperative," he said, "that violence can only be countered by violence."

Politicians who have known Chaudhuri aver that it is a matter of time before he comes out of Solanki's shadow. They point out that Chaudhuri's closeness is only a post-1980 phenomenon. Before that he was closely identified with Darji, who persuaded him in the early '70s to give up his engineer's job and enter politics. Chaudhuri was first made a minister in the Ghanshyam Oza ministry in 1975, the year he was elected to the assembly from Vyara taluka in Surat district. He was again a minister in the short-lived Solanki ministry in 1976. When the Congress (I) returned to power, a senior Gujarat politician revealed, Darji was in two minds which of his two disciples he should back—Solanki or Chaudhuri—for the chief ministership. Solanki won but apparently piled humiliation on Chaudhuri later. Meanwhile, Darji moved away from Solanki and when it came to choosing between Darji and Solanki, Chaudhuri plumped for the man in power. He even let Solanki use him to whittle down Darji's following among tribals. But, as this politician maintained, "nobody forgets anything in politics, least of all humiliation", and Chaudhuri will soon distance himself from Solanki.

Moving out of Solanki's shadow might not prove very difficult for Chaudhuri. He is intelligent enough to realise the propaganda gains of being seen as his own man. What might not prove as easy is to be seen as the leader of all sections of the people. He showed early consciousness of this problem. In an interview over Doordarshan he declared: "I want to assure the people of Gujarat that I am not the representative of any particular section or caste. I am the representative of the whole of Gujarat and I want (them) to evaluate my decisions accordingly." The immediate reaction to his appeal was lukewarm. Chimanbhai Patel, the Janata Party leader who was grinning when Solanki quit, echoed the general feeling towards Chaudhuri when he said: "The new chief minister does not inspire much confidence but let us give him a chance."

The party high command was hoping that the people of Gujarat would do just that while on its part it did what it could to make his task easier. His appointment had barely been announced when Makhan Lal Fotedar, political aide to Rajiv, was ringing up dissident leaders to urge them to extend their cooperation. Assuring them that Chaudhuri was the high command's and not Solanki's nominee, Fotedar argued that Chaudhuri would act on the advice he got from seniors. Darji and Yogendra Makwana, Harijan leader and Union minister of state for health, were quickly persuaded to issue statements extending support to Chaudhuri. Said Darji: "Chaudhuri has my full backing."

Makwana, an outspoken and dynamic leader who was once Solanki's close friend and is now his implacable foe, then caught the media's attention by flying in to Ahmedabad and setting about the task of helping to restore peace. People close to him gave it out that he would be in Gujarat for 10 days but he was back in Delhi in three days. Reports appeared that he had been summoned back because his contention that he had been sent by Rajiv to help Chaudhuri had embarrassed the high command. Reportedly it was felt that when the need of the hour was to

MADHAVSINH SOLANKI

Turning Point

WHEN Madhavsinh Solanki resigned the chief ministership of Gujarat on July 6, he had been in power for 118 days in his second successive term. As tenures go, no chief minister of the 25-year-old state has been in power for such a brief one. But if that is one record Solanki could not be proud of, the charismatic Kshatriya leader also holds another record he can pride himself on: of being, in his first tenure, the only chief minister of Gujarat to have lasted a full term. In the creation of these two records lies the full story of a man who has nobody but himself to blame for being asked to quit.

Barely four months ago, Solanki's political stock could not have been higher. The party high command had backed him in the selection of candidates for the assembly elections and ignored the dissidents. When the party won 149 seats in the 182-member assembly, the decision seemed politically sound. But the state soon became a theatre for a continuing war between castes and communities. It all started with an anti-reservations agitation but, with opposition parties seeing a tailor-made political opportunity, soon metamorphosed into a 'remove Solanki' campaign. Conscious of the domino effect of conceding the demand, the party high command resisted it till it received reports of the communal and caste divides the violence was creating. Within 18 days of the first such report, Solanki was asked to go. An opposition MLA reflected the general feeling when he said: "Solanki was so well entrenched. But he dug his own grave."

There could be little dispute with the assessment. In January, Solanki had increased reservations for the backward castes when there was neither any demand nor need for it. The agitationists charged that the move was political, aimed at winning the March elections, but there is little doubt that Solanki also genuinely believes in uplifting the backwards. But Solanki had moved too fast too soon and had antagonised the still powerful high-castes. In early June came evidence that Solanki was planning to make cynical political capital of his support among his castemen. A convention of Kshatriyas was held in Baroda where his father-in-law Ishwarbhai Chavda and one of Solanki's ministers made speeches affirming the Kshatriyas' right to rule. There was no evidence to directly link Solanki with the convention but there was little doubt that it had his blessings. For the party high command, this was the first alarm bell.

Solanki's desperation grew partly out of his isolation within the party. In the five years that he has been in power, he had systematically alienated every other leader of any eminence. The list of leaders whom he sidelined makes impressive reading: Ratubhai Adani, Yogendra Makwana, Sanat Mehta, Manoharsinh Jadeja and Jinabhai Darji. Of these, Mehta, Makwana and Darji had played a prominent role in bringing him to power. The rift meant that there was nobody in the top rung of the leadership who could give him a worthwhile second opinion. The Gujarat Governor, B.K. Nehru, tried to advise Solanki but he had reached a stage where he was immune to any suggestions which did shore up the image of Chaudhuri as the man in command, this was doing just the opposite. Sources close to Makwana denied there was anything unusual in his quick return and Moopanar pointed out that Makwana was not the only MP who had been asked to go to Gujarat to help restore peace. Said Moopanar: "We have asked all MP's to go there. It is only the media which singled out Makwana."

Nevertheless, there was no denying that the party leadership was giving special attention to Gujarat. For one, Rajiv was still keeping his lines open to sources of information from the state. Even after Chaudhuri had taken over, he sent for Hitendra Desai—the former chief minister who has a clean image and is not aligned with any faction in the party. Desai spent half an hour with the prime minister—double the time for normal appointments with Rajiv—apprising him of the situation there. Desai later met several other top party leaders, including Home Minister S.B. Chavan and Moopanar.

The Congress(I) also initiated attempts to restore some of the links that Solanki had ruptured. One such was the local press whom Solanki had antagonised when his policemen had burnt the offices of the Gujarat Samachar. Union Minister of State for Information and Broadcasting Vithalrao Gadgil flew to Ahmedabad to meet the press. Denying that there was any political significance attached to his visit, Gadgil met editors to try and create a more congenial relationship between the press and the executive.

However, reason was at a premium among the anti-reservationists who were still refusing to call off their agitation. They celebrated the Monday after Solanki's exit as "victory day" but Shankerbhai Patel, the president of the Parents Association spearheading the stir, announced that their agitation would continue. There was now growing evidence, however, that popular support for the stir was tapering off. The agitation has now gone on for over five months and the people want normalcy. Parents and their wards are keen that schools be reopened. The Government showed recognition of this when it persuaded school managements to open schools after almost four months but the real confrontation with the anti-reservationists will come if and when it tries to hold examinations. The agitationists still inspire fear: in Ahmedabad's schools, attendance was mostly at an abysmal 15 per cent in the first few days after they reopened. And it did not help anybody's nerves when a bomb exploded in one school.

The violence has taken a toll of over 220 lives. Curfew is still on in several parts of the walled city in Ahmedabad, creating records of sorts. Bombs and grenades, some of them highly explosive, still continue to be found in the city. Police intelligence, weak at all times but pathetic of late, had still not been able to identify and clamp down on those who have been stabbing innocent people just to keep tension alive. The army's brass was known to be keen to withdraw from Ahmedabad and Baroda but the people still felt that only the army spelt security. And the administration was making little headway in persuading governments, panchayat and municipal workers to call off their month-old strike.

The state's ailing health was a grave source of worry and apprehension was widespread over Chaudhuri's ability to nurse it back to its blooming self. Gujarat is no stranger to political instability: in its 25 years, Solanki was the first chief minister to have completed his (first) full term in office. The odds against Chaudhuri surviving till the next elections are considered none too bright. His mettle will really be tested in the weeks ahead. Nobody is sure he will succeed but not many want him to fail. The price of failure could be too high even for a prosperous state like Gujarat.

Solanki: at the crossroads not meet his own predilections. Notes former chief minister Chimanbhai Patel, "Solanki got rid of all his critics and surrounded himself by faceless people. This was one of the main reasons why he was unable to get around the anti-reservations stir."

In fact, Solanki's world had shrunk to encompass only those people who were close to him, mainly, his friends. He spared no effort to brighten up their lives. Mrugesh Jaikrishna was made the chairman of one of the companies of the Gujarat Industrial Investment Corporation: Mrugesh's wife, Parul, was made a director of the Gujarat State Tourism Corporation; Ashok Bhogilal Patel was made director of the Gujarat State Fertiliser Corporation; Narendra Bhuva was made chairman of the Gujarat Mineral Development Corporation, and so on. The well-being of friends mattered to him more than the welfare of government institutions: K.K. Kanoria was given land on the outskirts of Ahmedabad to build a private hospital at a rate lower than was offered to the Indian Space Research Organisation.

Solanki's record book was not always full of black marks. Industry in Gujarat really bloomed during his first term as over 150 industrial estates mushroomed over the state. Agriculture also prospered and today fully 50 per cent of the agricultural land is irrigated. Foodgrains are being given on subsidised rates to poor families and education has been made free for girls. A mid-day meal scheme, costing Rs 110 crore, has been introduced for children which will benefit over 50 lakhs of them. Expectedly, all these populist moves had made him popular. As Madhuben Gohil, a maidservant in Ahmedabad, said: "Had it not been for Solanki, my child would have gone hungry on most of the days in school."

There is little doubt that the backward classes see Solanki as their champion, if somewhat flawed by personal ambition. And the high command knows this, which is why top leaders like Rajendra Kumari Bajpai and V.P. Singh have been hinting that he would be brought to the Centre. Rajiv Gandhi also did not categorically rule it out in his press conference. But if Solanki's public statements are anything to go by, then he may not be very keen to get back into the hurly-burly of politics. As he told INDIA TODAY "Politics is not my forte. I was in it because so much of responsibility was thrust on me and one cannot shirk it when one is committed to serve the people." But, then, if Solanki was the same man both in private and in public he would not be at the crossroads he found himself at last fortnight.

Labourers clearing rubble: debris of hate

"One feels there is no point in living now."

QAMRUNNISA
housewife

"Why has all this happened?"

MIRIAMBIBI idol-maker

RIOT VICTIMS

The Vicious Circle

QAMRUNNISA'S little world has come to an end. Twice over, her little household has been uprooted by communal frenzy. In 1969, when riots shook Ahmedabad, her husband became the target of mob fury. Helpless, she moved with her seven little children to Prantij in Sabarkantha district, where she took up various odd jobs to bring up her children. Gathering her savings of all these years, she returned to Ahmedabad a year ago, hoping to start life anew. Her sons had also found jobs by now and she thought they were at last settled in their little house in Bapunagar, a labour locality on the city's outskirts.

But as fate would have it, ransacking mobs aided by rebellious policemen again reduced her house to rubble on April 22. Hers was just one of the 280 houses destroyed in the area. Qamrunnisa, who was till recently in a refugee camp with some 5,000 other Muslims at Aman Chowk, has been struck speechless by this cruel quirk of fate. Once again, she is bravely trying to pick up the pieces, but the will to live is barely flickering. "One feels there is no point in living now", she says with a sad nod.

Qamrunnisa is not alone in her suffering. There are thousands like her in the city who find themselves crushed under the unfeeling wheel of circumstance. Over 600 families have been dishoused and some 1,000 are living in the pathetic ruins of what used to be their homes. And yet, most of them have nothing to do with the agitation.

Though the casualties in the '69 riots were far greater, the damage to the city's social fabric this time is more frightening. The disturbances, initially confined to Ahmedabad, have steadily spread to other parts of the state. In a city that prided itself on its mixed heritage, it is not uncommon today to find people talking of teaching lessons to the other community. Vicious rumours are spread to incite communal passions. Cassettes containing inflammatory speeches are circulated. The communal hatred seething in the city is like nowhere else and never before. The Gujarati, known for his pragmatism and tolerance, is today a person easily swayed by emotions that defy reason. Says former prime minister Morarji Desai: "Gujarat has gone mad."

Everything has suddenly boiled down to caste and religion. Neighbour distrusts neighbour and people who had lived peacefully side by side for ages have overnight become enemies. Miriambibi, for instance, has never felt as alienated as she does today. Living in Delhi Chakla, a Hindu-dominated area, this old housewife followed the life-style of her neighbours, wearing the traditional Gujarati sari and making idols of Hindu gods to supplement her income. On March 18, her husband's cycle repair shop was looted and burnt. Terror-struck, she moved to her sister's house some distance away. On June 9, her house was looted by Hindu mobs emboldened by the Rath Yatra. Not ready to take any more chances, she decided to shift to a Muslim-dominated area. But this has not solved all her problems. As communal hatred sweeps the city, Miriambibi wonders if she would be allowed by her new neighbours to practise her craft of idol-making. Confused, she asks, "Why has all this happened?"

If the '69 riots are still remembered as one of the worst in the country, the current disturbances are worse still. The '69 riots, which lasted three days, were confined to the eastern suburbs of Amraiwadi, Bapunagar, Gomtipur, Saraspur and Naroda which had mainly a migrant population. Most of the inhabitants were industrial labourers from Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan and Maharashtra. This time round, the violence has been concentrated in the walled city where Muslims and Gujarati Hindus have been living together for decades.

An example of the severing of past ties is Peeli Chal in Rakhial, a poor locality where Hindus and Muslims have lived together for years. Here, neighbours looted the houses of eight Muslim families when they fled fearing an attack. In Morarji Chowk in Bapunagar, bidiworker Goramma Padmashalli was told by her Muslim neighbours to run away as they feared an attack on Hindu homes. When she picked up whatever she could and fled, her neighbours broke into her house and ransacked it.

Though the violence is mostly communal, what makes the situation more ominous is the parallel casteist clashes. Since Harijans happen to live alongside Muslims in most poor localities, they too have been victims of attacks by caste Hindus. And naturally they have joined hands with their Muslim neighbours.

"I thought Superlac would just transform our walls...

...but look what it's done to my husband."

"It was real magic. The dull walls suddenly sprang to life. The patchy surface gave way to a smooth, beautiful look. The pretty pastels made our house so inviting, so good to live in. 44 exciting shades to try out new decor ideas with. Pale Corn. Horizon Blue. And so easy to keep spotlessly clean. Even the children can do it with a little soap and water. No stains. No damp. It was wonderful!

"What was even more wonderful was the effect it had on my husband. He was a changed man. Bringing me flowers. Buying up the market. I've even heard him humming in the bathroom. Honestly, I never imagined what a plastic emulsion like Superlac could do to our lives."

That's Superlac. An extraordinary wallpaint made by one of the leading paint companies in the country today. People who've been perfecting the art of paint making over the years. The Shalimar people.

Try Superlac. And just watch your world change!

We're really pulling out the stops.

More non-stop London flights than anyone else.

Altogether we operate fourteen flights a week to London from India – that's more than any other airline. And eight of these are non-stop flights – that's also more than any other airline.

But it's not just in non-stop flying that we excel. Our service is non-stop too. Both on the ground, with our Indian Visitors Service, and in the air, with Indian stewardesses and vegetarian meals, we provide a thoroughly professional and caring service. No wonder we're the world's favourite airline.

Harijans and Muslims in Ahmedabad mostly live in one-room tenements known as chalis. These usually have thatched roofs and are surrounded by tall buildings housing caste Hindus. All over Ahmedabad, a similar pattern has been found: the Hindus gather on their terraces at night and stone the chalis or throw petrol bombs and lighted torches. Vadigam area in Dariapur experienced one such attack. Across the road is Nagina Pole which is Muslim-dominated. Lighted torches were thrown from the Vadigam buildings, destroying numerous houses in Nagina Pole. In Meghaninagar, a Harijan locality called Jogeshwari-na-jhopda is surrounded by flats of caste Hindus. Here too, the same strategy was adopted and many huts-ments were destroyed.

Last fortnight, the Government was asking most of the refugees at relief camps to go back home but they could only nod dumbly to that as their homes had either been destroyed in the fires or damaged beyond recognition. Those who had got compensation to rebuild their houses did not want to return for fear of being attacked again. Asked Banubibi, an old housewife from Kalupur in the walled city, "How can we go back? There is so much communal hatred all around." Banubibi's house was burnt down in 1969. Her husband took a loan of Rs 12,000 to rebuild it. The house was looted and damaged again when she and her family fled from rampaging mobs in last month's violence. Among the things looted was a pressure cooker meant as a gift for her daughter's wedding.

The relief camps present a pathetic picture. Thousands of desolate people sit staring vacantly into space and clutching their leftover belongings. They are trying to muster strength to piece back their shattered lives. Among them is Mumtaz, an old housewife. Her house was burnt and her son killed in police firing. Though she has got Rs 24,000 as compensation, she asks: "Will it make my son rise from his grave?"

In a dingy municipal school in Kadva Pole in Dariapur are lodged over a dozen families whose houses were burnt in Dabgarwad last month. Muslims from surrounding areas had converged on their houses and set them on fire after locking them in. Seven Dabgars, who are traditional drum-makers, had been roasted alive. The families now lodged at the school are terror-struck. Asks Ambalal Kalidas Dabgar: "We have been living in this Muslim locality ever since we were born. But how can we go back and live there after having seen our houses go up in flames. This might happen again since both the communities are crying for each other's blood." Also at the relief camp is Sadhna Dabgar who was to get married on May 27. Her house was burnt down by a Muslim mob. Among the belongings lost were her wedding clothes and jewellery. In a voice tinged with emotion, she says: "I was looking forward to a new life. Now this tragedy has ruined us. There is no question of getting married now."

"How can we go back? There is so much hatred all around."

WHILE the Muslims have migrated to Muslim areas, the Hindus have moved out of out of the walled city to Hindu areas. Many have to their relatives in the villages. Some have even left the state. Nazir Mohammed, a textile worker who had lived in Gujarat for the past 30 years, has left for Akola in Maharashtra, since his house in Gomtipur was looted and destroyed.

Laxmi Chauhan, who had a small two-room house in Hardesnagar, has found shelter in a verandah, thanks to a kind family. Her house was looted and burnt by mobs and she had to flee with her six-year-old child. She went from hospital to hospital looking for her missing husband. She had already given him up for dead when she learnt of his escape to his native village in Rajasthan.

The distrust was never so deep. Earlier, various Hindu organisations would rush to the Muslims' rescue and relief. This time their volunteers can be seen only in Hindu localities and camps housing Hindu refugees. Instances of Hindus and Muslims giving shelter to each other have also become rare. The communal divide, it seems, is now complete.

In suburban Gomtipur near Char Toda Kabristan is a congested Muslim locality with about 750 shanty-like houses of textile labourers. Here the Muslims do not dread the Hindus living around them. Instead, they dread the police. And they have good reason to because in mid-May soon after a police inspector was shot dead in Dariapur, the police let loose a reign of terror in the area as they suspected that the inspector had been shot by a Muslim. There had been no trouble in the area until then. But the police took the help of local goondas and gave it a communal colour.

The firing on May 12 had been indiscriminate. Four had died and 56 had been injured in the firing. Over 50 houses had been burnt and terrified Muslims had fled to the relief camp set up in the cemetery nearby. And yet, the police said they had fired to control the Muslims who went on a rampage. Circumstantial evidence proves otherwise. Only Muslim houses and shops in the area bear signs of looting and arson. Says Ibrahim Khan, a mill-worker: "Uniformed policemen were setting our houses on fire. We could not believe it."

Some are now leaving the camps and returning to deserted areas like Bapunagar to rebuild their homes. One of them is Mohammed Hussein, a 42-year-old labourer. When mobs attacked his house on April 22, he fled with his family to a relief camp. On May 12, the mobs set fire to his house. Now he is cleaning the rubble to rebuild his house.

It will take ages for the wounds to heal. The tragedy is too intense; the damage to the state's social fabric too serious. Saidabibi of Rakhial, for one, feels it is not easy to wipe off memories of the holocaust. Her dramatist father, Rafiq Dehlvi, had adopted a Harijan boy about four decades ago. When the boy grew up, nobody was ready to marry him as he was considered to be neither a Harijan nor a Muslim. Dehlvi married him to his own daughter. In the '69 riots, Dehlvi was murdered. Two months ago, Saida's husband too was stoned to death by a rioting mob. A broken Saida feels there is little to live for now. Like Qamrunnisa, her world has been trod on twice over.

If you think computers are to we have one that's as easy And just as indispensable.

The Chi² is on your desk. You switch on 'Power'.

You unwrap a diskette. Looks like a 45 rpm record.

You insert it into the Chi².

Instantly, the screen's covered with rows and columns.

You type in 'Years' and 'Sales', and punch in relevant figures.

Now press a key. Hey! The screen has a graph!

The Chi², our new computer.

If you can dial a telephone number, you can use it.

And once you do, you realise just how indispensable it is.

Suddenly, the Chi² puts you completely in charge of your growth and your future: it's at your fingertips.

And as we've shown above, all you need to do with them is touch the keys a few times.

Chi²: It's benign but it's powerful

Though the Chi² makes computing look like child's play, it's got the guts to match bigger and costlier systems.

Because, besides other things, the Chi² is IBM PC 'compatible'. Which means, like the world's largest selling personal computer, it can run over 5,000 tried and trusted programs.

That means you can use it in 5,000 different ways.

Chi²: Ready to grow with you

And in case these readymade programs don't suit you, we'll help to devise some more specially for you.

Then there's something even more special:

The Chi² PC/XT.

A computer as simple, as advanced, but with a higher storage capacity to begin with.

And because IBM PC software grows with the times, the Chi² PC and PC/XT will be useful for years.

So all you need to do now is make a telephone call. To our office.

Y.V. CHANDRACHUD

"We are not spineless"

THE LAST decade has seen the Indian judiciary go through rapid transition, for the better in some aspects, and for worse in others. Beginning with the Emergency, the hallowed institution has come under increasing pressures and has also shown signs of internal fissures at times, bringing the judiciary, and more so the Supreme Court of India in limelight. The judges' conduct and their judgements have been questioned as never before. Yet many landmark judgements have been delivered.

Through much of this eventful period Yeshwant Vishnu Chandrachud has had to hold centre-stage as the chief justice of India. "It is not an easy job...my biggest achievement is that I am leaving an undivided court for my successor," he now says reflecting philosophically. As India's longest-serving chief justice, he has seen more change and controversy in his seven years than any of his predecessors and has also had the misfortune of seeing charges of corruption levelled against members of his family.

More important, however, he has seen through a period of rapid change, of an increasingly nebulous love-hate relationship with the Government and of the evolution of the concept of public interest litigation. His critics say he and the court during his tenure were found wanting on crucial occasions. Civil liberties activists question his judgements during the Emergency throwing out habeas corpus cases and his siding with the minority in the Keshavanand Bharati case.

Last week on the eve of his retirement, Chandrachud who had spent 25 years as a judge, beginning with the Bombay High Court in 1961, looked back on all this with remarkable candour, publicly expressing regrets for taking "too legalistic" a view of the habeas corpus cases and admitting in retrospect that the majority judgement in the Keshavanand Bharati case was correct.

But controversy did not spare him on even his last day in the office. A small section of the Bar boycotted his farewell dinner party because of his role in the habeas corpus cases and partly because of the ridiculously puerile accusation that he was backing the corrupt contractor of the court canteen. Yet he spared time to talk to Principal Correspondent SHEKHAR GUPTA in an interview, interrupted by well-wishers on farewell calls, the inevitable farewell functions and ended just as he boarded the car for his last day in the office. Chandrachud touched upon a wide range of subjects. Excerpts:

Q. You have spent a quarter century as a judge. How do you look back at your innings?

A. To have been a judge for 25 years is one of the finest things that could happen to me. I love to write judgements. I spend enormous time in conceiving and composing them. And still my disappointment is that I could not find enough time to produce better judgements after coming to the Supreme Court. If I may say so in all humility one of my achievements is that I am handing over an undivided court to my successor, a court marked by friendship and solidarity. There are ideological differences among the judges but no factions. The other achievement of which anyone may feel proud is the all-round improvement in the relations with the Bar and emergence of able juniors.

> "We seek immortality through the pages of law reporters and our judgements are frightfully long, almost so long as to discourage the most ardent follower of law from reading them."

Q. In this period, how did you see the judicial system evolve in the country —for better or worse?

A. I have no doubt that the judicial system has evolved for the better in the post-Independence era. Today there is a greater awareness of social commitment amongst judges than ever before. The system has served us well and truly. It needs improvement, not annihilation.

Q. Judicial delays, political pressures, decreasing dignity of the judge's office—these are considered as problems confronting the judiciary. In which order of importance do you place them?

A. I disagree with the basic premise underlying this question. I have not seen acceptable evidence of political pressures on the judiciary. I do not also agree that the judge's office has suffered indignity. Insofar as delays are concerned, law's delays are quite notorious. I should have thought that the major problem confronting the judicial system today is the enormous flow of work which is difficult to dispose of within a reasonable period. Appointment of more judges is not the answer because what is needed is the appointment of judges who are competent.

Q. Aren't judges themselves sometimes responsible for delays? Or do lawyers indulge in filibuster?

A. Judges cannot be fully absolved from the responsibility for delays. It is now time that at least the Supreme Court stops delivering judgements in every case that is argued before it. In judgements of affirmation, a simple order should suffice. But judges are, after all, human beings and the desire for immortality is a common human failing. We seek immortality through the pages of law reporters and our judgements are frightfully long, almost so long as to discourage the most ardent follower of law from reading them. So much scholarship is often wasted on the desert air and full many a judgement is born to blush unread.

Insofar as litigants are concerned, whether it is a private party or government, they are equally to blame for delays. Government counsel ask for adjournments even more than the counsel for private parties do.

Q. What can be done to reverse this situation?

A. In the speeches that I have made on the Law Days during the last five years, I have suggested remedies to reverse this situation. Reduction in the length of oral arguments, but not their elimination, and the filing of written briefs can appreciably help solve the problem of arrears. Setting up of expert tribunals at national level chaired by retired Supreme Court judges and manned by retired high court judges will also help to remedy the situation. But the appointment of unqualified persons on these tribunals is a remedy worse than the disease.

Q. Is the institution of judiciary today capable of resisting political and administrative pressures?

A. The judiciary today is in a position in which it can pride itself for its independence and integrity. In the midst of an all-round fall in values, the judiciary stands like a rock of strength and character. Indeed that is why people flock in such large numbers to the courts for justice.

Q. Do you agree that the judgement in the judges' transfer case was an abject surrender to these pressures?

A. I disagree with that. It is one thing to say that a decision requires further examination and quite another to accuse the judges of submitting to political pressure. Some cases in the judges' case unquestionably require fresh consideration but I do not believe that political pressures played any part in the decision of that case. Some issues which come up before the court have political overtones. Judgements in such cases appear to have a political complexion. But that is not to be mixed up with political pressures.

Q. What exactly do you mean when you say that the judiciary is facing a threat from within? Are the judges getting increasingly spineless?

A. The threat from within is the result of materialistic ambitions and lack of contentment. One must cultivate a philosophical attitude and learn to take life as it comes in order to be able to maintain one's independence and serenity which are so essential for a judge. Judges know how to take care of their spines. There are isolated defaulters but they are exceptions. At the back of such defaults is the patronage which the Government commands.

Q. What can be done to counter the threat of this patronage?

A. The conditions of service of the judges must be improved and better post-retirement benefits should be made available to them. One problem which faces every judge at the time of retirement is that he or she has no house to live in. I have no house now and have written to the prime minister to help with the allotment of something like a DDA flat on priority basis. That is what the Government should do, provide houses through its housing boards at the prices charged to all others. That kind of courtesy to a retiring judge will help so much.

Q. This has reference to two of the most important constitutional cases of our times. In the Keshavanand Bharati case the Supreme Court said the Constitution had an unalterable basic structure. The Government sought to have it overruled in the Minerva Mills case where Mr Justice Bhagwati questioned the earlier judgement saying that members of the bench had hardly had the opportunity to discuss the case. Is that correct?

A. It is not correct. It was a marathon case and the hearing lasted about four months. There were several occasions when the judges met to discuss the points and exchange their views on these. What can be said, however, is that it was not possible for the judges to go through each other's draft judgements with due care.

Q. Is it correct that following this, two brother judges had written to you questioning Mr Justice Bhagwati's remarks? If so, what action did you take?

A. It is correct that two of my colleagues had written letters to me saying that there was a full discussion among the judges. It would have been improper to take any action on those letters. My constant endeavour has been to hold the court together, even at the cost of personal embarrassment. The institution has to be greater than the individuals who man it.

Q. Drawing from these questions, there is a feeling that you have had differences with your successor. Is that so?

A. There have been no notable differences between me and my successor Justice P.N. Bhagwati. No two individuals are alike and the approach of the judges at the level of Supreme Court is bound to differ from person to person. There is not a single incident outside the court which can be pointed out as reflecting personal animosity between me and Justice Bhagwati. Indeed he had a word of praise in his judgement for a toddler member of my family. That was generous on his part. In court matters we have confided in each other on numerous occasions. I relied upon him heavily in judicial work. The general impression that all is not well between us arose because of observations made by him in two of his judgements which, with respect, were somewhat harsh. But I did not allow these observations to mar our relationship.

Q. Were you consulted on the appointment of your successor?

A. Yes. My unquestioned choice was Justice Bhagwati.

Q. What can be done to counter the increasing executive interference in judges' appointment?

BHAWAN SINGH

A. The appointment of judges is too much of a clandestine affair. There should be wider consultation and a freer discussion on the question of judicial appointments. But once an appointment is decided upon or made, all criticism must cease.

Q. But you have already talked of the influence of caste in appointments, singling out the Allahabad High Court appointments as a specific example. Is that a problem?

A. Yes, casteism is a serious problem everywhere, in varying degrees. In fact I now regret having singled out the Allahabad High Court. This problem must be countered. But one thing I would like to say that the only place where there is no casteism is the Calcutta High Court.

Q. How serious is the problem of corruption in the judiciary?

A. The judiciary was almost totally free from corruption until a decade back. Unfortunately, today one hears whispers of a fall in judicial rectitude. I am not in a position to say that every one of such allegations is well-founded but there is a reason to suppose that occasionally judges invite suspicion by the way they conduct themselves. Caesar's wife has to be beyond suspicion. Increasing judges' emoluments will be no remedy because people with unlimited wealth can also be corrupt.

Q. And what about charges against members of your family for unfairly acquiring plots of land?

A. All this is untrue. My wife had applied for a bit of farmland in response to 'PRECISION' is now 'JYOTI' in collaboration with the world leaders Fairbanks' U.S.A.

A World of superior weighing technology that's sensitive to your problems.

In weighbridges that's precisely what you need

Did you ever calculate the losses you're incurring on each consignment that passes your gates. Even the smallest aberration can add up to huge amounts when you see the frequency. Jyoti Weighing Systems has a solution to your every Weighing Problem.

Three decades of weighing precision in diverse weighing requirements; has earned us this generic reputation—'Precision'. We are now 'Jyoti' in collaboration with the world leaders in weighing technology—Fairbanks U.S.A.

Our reputation has been painstakingly built on matching specific requirements of the most diverse customers. We actively interact with the customer to understand the particular needs of the location, application and environment, to be able to give the most effective solution (Whether its FCI or UPSE Board, NTPC or the Railways, Ordanance Factory or Coal India, J.K. Group, Jiyajee Row Mills, Tamilnadu Sugar or Ballarpur Industries) the process is the same.

Backed by the justifiably proud service and support, a buy from Jyoti is an investment in surety. A surety of technology, of precision. Of trouble free operation.

Unmatched Features

For instance—the special Operatorless Mechanical Recorder type Weighbridges offered for the first time in India, has special features like automatic Unit Weights, floaxial mechanism and Weight Detector for automatic and fraudproof working of the equipment, features that are not offered in Dial Recorders by even the multinational manufacturers.

Similarly features like automatic Zero Tracking, Balance Detection ,flourescent display and battery back-up in Electronic Indicator and Recorder Headworks, give unmatched performance and un-interrupted working even during power failures.

These electronic indicators are offered with greatly reduced graduations of as little as 5 kg., as against the 20 kg., conventionally offered; in Weighbridge of upto 40 tonne capacity. Our Drop Weight system offers still finer graduations of as little as 1 kg. upto 30 tonnes capacity. These weighbridges are highly suited to Weighment of expensive materials.

Modernising your existing Weighbridges

We also offer to upgrade your existing conventional Weighbridges into Automatic Weight Indicator and Recorder Weighbridges giving you the benefit of modern technology, at minimal costs.

Let us Weigh your Problems and find the solution.

some advertisement and deposited Rs 7,000. After some time we realised that the DDA was acquiring the particular piece of land. We were offered land elsewhere in return but the DDA said they could take up to 10 years giving us that. So we said we were not interested and sold our land back to DDA for Rs 7,001. And a journal said I had bought land for Rs 6 lakh and was going to make 35 lakh. The point is, before that someone had to give me six lakhs. If I have a crore of rupees I can make fifty crores. But do you think a judge has so much money? The sale was registered on a full-stamp sale deed two years before the allegations were published in a journal.

It hurts me that a prestigious journal should have done so. I did not contradict them for the simple reason that a judge cannot engage himself in a war with the press. I regret to say that I was not even extended the courtesy of answering the charges before they were published. What can a judge do? He has no platform where he can defend himself.

Q. And how do you explain your acquiring a Maruti car out of turn?

A. I had not applied for an out-of-turn allotment even though my own car, an Ambassador, is 18 years old. Probably the company decided to allot cars on priority basis in order to boost their sales. I was asked whether I wanted a car to be allotted early and I said yes, provided enough time was given to me to find the money to buy it. The provident fund came handy.

Q. There has even been controversy regarding your farewell dinner. A section of the Bar is threatening to boycott it over your alleged patronage to the "inefficient" court canteen contractor. Is the charge true?

A. Utterly false. Once again no newspaper sought my version before publishing this. The whole thing was planted by a daily newspaper correspondent here who is a briefless lawyer and wants to run the court canteen much against the wishes of the Bar.

Q. Would you then say that all allegations against you have been motivated since you have already stated that after the allegations on the land acquisition you were approached by certain people offering to publish a contradiction in case you recommended the name of a particular person for a judicial appointment?

A. Motivated yes, but I am not blaming anyone. I would like to clarify that the person for whom the favour was being sought never approached me. But indirectly that approach had come.

Q. There has been an increasing tendency to hold trials in camera or even in jails. Trials of suspected Sikh terrorists and Mrs Gandhi's alleged assassins are some such examples. How do you react to this trend?

BHAWAN SINGH

> "Some cases in the judges' case unquestionably require fresh consideration but I do not believe that political pressures played any part in the decision of that case."

A. To my mind a trial should be held in the open, in fierce gaze of publicity. That is what inspires confidence. People are likely to express doubts about trials held in jails. At the same time there may be special circumstances in some cases where, for example, it may be necessary to save witnesses from publicity.

Q. Do you think terrorism and the increasing threat to public servants dealing with the terrorists have put additional pressure on the judiciary particularly in a state such as Punjab?

A. No, I don't think a judge trying terrorists should have a particular apprehension to his life. We have session judges who try cases of murder every day. Let me tell you it is a remarkable feature of Indian life that not even once—barring the very odd exception—has a judge been physically harmed.

Q. What are your views on the concept of public interest litigation?

A. The phenomenon has increased the workload of the court but that has been one of the Supreme Court's most worthwhile experiments. However, great care must be taken to see that interlopers and busybodies do not take undue advantage of this venture and give it a bad name.

Q. At the same time the court has also taken cognizance of a national problem like the electoral rolls revision in Assam. Can the Supreme Court intervene in, say, the reservation controversy? What are your views on reservations?

A. Reservations is not a purely political issue. It involves consideration of constitutional provisions and the judges cannot keep themselves aloof. My view is that the policy of reservations in promotional posts requires a fresh look. It is also necessary to apply the 'means test' at some stage in order that the benefits of reservation are not monopolised by affluent families.

Q. Do you have any regrets, now in the evening of your career?

A. One of my regrets is that I was not able to speed up the course of justice. I had a long spell as chief justice but our whole system is so hidebound that it is difficult to introduce innovations.

Q. No regrets even on having stirred controversy by turning out the advocate's woman assistant wearing tight jeans?

A. Well (smiles), I had no difference with her jeans. What I objected to was the way she was strutting up and down the court with a comb peeping out of her hip-pocket. It was as if she wanted her jeans to be felt in the court. So I objected.

Q. How would you like to spend your time in retirement? Will you go back to teaching?

A. We have strange regulations governing aspects of life in our country. I love to teach but I understand that no one will accept me as a teacher since there is an age limit. I am quite relaxed and happy. I will now sit by the fireside and hear my wife hum a song. And I will read out to my grandchildren the masterpieces of literature which have been a source of great joy to me.

THE STOCK MARKETS

New Money Spinner

THREE floors below, you can hear the excited buzz, like bees collecting honey. Up the staircase, it becomes increasingly difficult to make your way as the loiterers and hangers-on thicken into groups and then a crowd. On the third floor landing, you have to wade through the crush, and the buzz has become a deafening roar. Through a door and into the large, makeshift trading ring of the Bombay Stock Exchange (BSE), the frenzy of the action finally hits you with all its force.

Brokers, jobbers, brokers' clerks and other assorted animals that make up the stock-market fraternity—basically the bulls and the bears—are yelling at the top of their voices, paan-stained mouths twisted into unpretty shapes as arms, hands and fingers are waved, twisted and twirled in the frenetic business of striking deals and making or losing money. Above a door in the distance, the Goddess Lakshmi and Mahatma Gandhi adorn a badly plastered wall, while fans at every turn and corner whirr in furious futility as the humidity of the city combines with the heat of the action to make for sweat-soaked kurtas and imparts an edge of stained perspiration to the black caps that adorn broker heads. High above the action, a large glass panel lights up with various numbers, indicating to the brokers below that their offices want them to get on to the hot lines that link the offices to the scene of the action. Banks of telephones—over 100 in number—line the perimeter of the trading ring, near one end of which a battered old man sits on a broken bench, dishing out water in aluminium lotas that the dalals gulp down hurriedly before rushing back to the scene of activity for some more frenetic yelling and waving and wheeling and dealing.

Despite the frenzy, the setting fails to suggest big money: the hall is a makeshift affair, corrugated tin sheets make do for walls, the odd pieces of furniture strewn around are invariably in need of repair, steel tube girders point at odd angles, and on a wet day the rain beats in. Yet this large, ungainly 'room' sees daily business transactions of up to Rs 7 crore and more on scores of share counters, and represents for millions of investors across the country a new El Dorado.

Over the last six months, the unprecedented boom on the stock-market has resulted in the market value of shares going up from Rs 9,984 crore in December 1984 to more than Rs 15,000 crore now. That means a net gain of over Rs 5,000 crore to the seven million investors in the country. The investors themselves numbered barely two million five years ago, but their numbers are growing by leaps and bounds. Today, there are three times as many share investors as income-tax payers, denoting the ultimate flowering of Indian capitalism. The experts now predict that more than 15 million Indians will be hooked on to the stock-market in the next three or four years. In poverty-stricken India, the stock-market has finally transformed itself from an esoteric club of dalals who speak a strange language to the new money-spinning hope of the middle class.

J.T.V.Satyanarayana Rao is a 28-year-old sales executive in a computer firm in Hyderabad. In May last year, he wanted to raise Rs 4,000 quickly to buy an Enfield Bullet motorcycle after selling his Yezdi vehicle, so he did something that someone in his station in life would not have thought of doing some years ago: he bought 100 shares in Ind-Suzuki. His parents eventually paid for his new motorcycle, so his initial investment has, after a series of reinvestments, become Rs 25,000. Rao is now an avid investor: he has borrowed money at 36 per cent interest to invest in shares that he thinks will give him a 50 to 100 per cent return in the short span of a year.

V.J. Parikh is a retired professor from the Birla Institute of Technology and Science, and now settled in Delhi. On his morning constitutional, he meets up with fellow-retirees on a park bench, and the subject of discussion is invariably the share-market.

Ashwini Windlass is the senior corporate manager in a Delhi drug firm. Three years ago, he was advised by a fellow-passenger on a flight to Bombay to buy shares in Premier Automobiles. The price shot up from Rs 95 to Rs 220 in 16 days. Windlass recalls. He reinvested his takings and now has an investment portfolio that runs into lakhs of rupees. Last year he made many times more than his substantial salary by playing the market.

Journalist Kewal Varma recalls with surprise how his 75-year-old mother-in-law, Ram Pyari, asked him some time ago for advice on which debentures to buy. "I didn't even know she had heard of something called debentures," Varma recalls with amusement.

The surprise is everywhere. There is so much money now being poured into the stock-market that companies asking for share subscriptions are flooded with offers 10 to 50 times more than what is required. Hero Honda Motors recently floated shares worth Rs 4.46 crore, and was offered Rs 46.8 crore. In August last year, Roche Products floated shares worth Rs 81 lakh, and was offered Rs 27 crore. And a few months ago, Kinetic Honda was offered 150 times the amount it wanted. The Industrial Credit and Investment Corporation of India (ICICI) has managed share issues worth Rs 9 crore this year; it has got offers from the public for Rs 99 crore.

Five years ago, share and debenture issues by all companies put together totalled Rs 100 crore in a full year. Now one company alone raises Rs 100 crore in less than a month. And last year, investors put Rs 2,000 crore into new issues: more than the Rs 1,746 crore which the Government collected through the income tax. This year, says D.R. Mehta, controller of Capital Issues in the Finance Ministry, the figure is expected to be between Rs 2,500 crore and Rs 3,000 crore.

Who is investing, and why? The answers: almost everybody, and because there is quick money to be made. An employee in the Delhi office of a fertiliser company says that two years ago only five of his 100 colleagues used to take an interest in stocks and shares. Now 70 of them—both white collar and brown collar—are investors. In the capital's Bahadur Shah Zafar Marg, engineers working for the Tata Consultancy Services use their lunch hour to take a quick trip to the Delhi Stock Exchange on nearby Asaf Ali Road, to watch the action, consult their brokers and make investment decisions.

Intrigued by the sudden broad-basing of the investor population, Hindustan Lever decided recently to find out who the new investors were, and commissioned a market research company to do a survey. The surveyors quizzed people queueing up outside bank offices to subscribe to share issues and found that those waiting in line included office peons and bus drivers working for the Bombay Electric Supply and Transport (BEST).

The fever has spread up and down the social and economic ladder, and fanned out from the big metropolises to the smaller cities and burgeoning towns where more money is now known to be available on tap than even financial whiz-kids had imagined. There are investors like Y.S.N. Murthy, an officer in the Hyderabad office of the Life Insurance Corporation (LIC) who invests in shares because the LIC will not give him a pension when he retires, and others like Ludhiana bank clerk Y.S.Kohli who sees in the stock-market a safe way of adding to his income in a manner that his bank cannot object: "Some of my colleagues run their own businesses on the side, but the stock-market is perfectly legal and gives me good returns," says Kohli.

IN GEOGRAPHICAL terms, eight new stock exchanges have been opened in the last three years, adding to the five that existed earlier in Bombay, Calcutta, Delhi, Ahmedabad and Madras. Already, the membership of the Ludhiana Stock Exchange commands a premium of Rs 20,000, and of the Kanpur exchange Rs65,000. In Delhi, which has come close to overtaking Calcutta in stock-market importance, the premium for membership of the stock exchange is a staggering Rs 4 lakh. And in towns that do not yet have stock-markets, sub-brokers and informal investors' clubs do a roaring business. Pramod Kohli, a partner in the Delhi stockbroking firm of Sikander Lal and Co, says he gets a staggering amount of business from such far-flung towns as Ajmer, Aligarh, Hardwar, Rishikesh, Pune, Lucknow and Agra. And in Chandigarh, S.P. Bhatia takes time off from his duties as a junior officer in the Allahabad Bank to run an investors' club that meets fortnightly in a local restaurant. The business conducted at each meeting of the club often crosses Rs 1 lakh, and Bhatia occasionally makes a trip to Delhi to do business with brokers.

Investors' clubs have sprouted even in the big cities where stock exchanges are easily accessible. In Bombay, a dozen employees of Imageads and Communications Pvt Ltd have pooled their finances to make joint investment decisions. And at the Indian Military Academy in Dehra Dun, officer cadets go through a course in share investments, where they are advised not to waste their precious savings on such outdated favourites as fixed deposits in banks.

The speed and ease with which the stock-market has entered ordinary people's lives is entirely understandable. M.R. Mayya, executive director of the BSE points out that during the 1960s share prices rose on average by only 6 per cent, much less than the 80 per cent increase in wholesale prices. During the 1970s, share prices continued to rise slower than general prices. Says Mayya: "Shares were simply not a good investment earlier. Today they are, because they provide an effective hedge against inflation and yield handsome returns." He is absolutely right, for share prices this year alone have risen by an average of 56 per cent, or close to 10 per cent a month. And some of the leading scrips have doubled and trebled in market value, yielding undreamt of windfalls to the lucky investors. Bajaj Auto shares, for instance, have shot up from Rs 865 in January to Rs 1,675 in July, Blue Star from Rs 33 to Rs 70, Indian Photographic Company from Rs 57.50 to Rs 145, Kinetic Engineering from Rs 135 to Rs 305, TISCO from Rs 382 to Rs 890, and so on. "The price increase in shares is unbelievable," says P.N. Vijay, manager of the Grindlays Bank's merchant banking division. "The share prices of some companies have doubled in a single day. Sometimes people in company managements have got so worried by the price rise that they have rung me up asking if a takeover raid is being mounted." Even rumours are enough to set off quantum leaps in prices: an investment analyst in Bombay points out that the shares of Scooters India jumped from Rs 5 to Rs 20 on the strength of market rumour that Bajaj Auto might be taking over the scooter company.

With such extraordinary price increases now a fact of stock-market life, numerous stories do the rounds about overnight riches: Bimal Jain, a New Delhi housewife, bought 500 debentures of Reliance Textiles a year ago at their then market price of Rs 92. The company then offered to convert these into shares which are ruling at record levels. Jain's initial investment of Rs 46,000 is now worth Rs 1.5 lakh in barely a year.

Such easy pickings may not always be available, and certainly the unprecedented boom that the stock-market has witnessed this year cannot continue indefinitely; some sort of stability must return and indeed this transition is already evident. Nevertheless, there is no turning back from the new investor awareness, the financial awakening of the middle class as the stock-market becomes a central factor in household financial planning. Equally important, the general

Bulls vs Bears

SOME time ago a few gentlemen on Wall Street got together to feed a computer a whole lot of information on the stock-market and find out how to beat the system. The computer took a day to come up with the answer: "Buy low, sell high!"

Actually, it's not that simple. The market is peopled with two kinds of animals: the bulls and the bears. The bull—the tejiwala—makes money when share prices are rising, as in the current phase, and the bear—the mandiwala—when the prices are falling. Shakespeare's homily "There is a tide in the affairs of men" is best understood when applied to the share bazar, because the key to being a successful bull or bear is to understand, as Ram K. Piparaiya, investment consultant, says: "That there is no sure way of knowing when prices will rise or fall, but that they will rise and fall and to catch the rise or the fall at its start and ride it up or down."

There are two kinds of scrips: 'A' group securities, which number 49 on the Bombay Stock Exchange (BSE) and the 'B' group which accounts for 277 companies on the BSE. Debentures can also be traded and the BSE currently lists 32 such 'A' group securities, also known as "specified" securities which are usually the big daddies of the market: ACC, TISCO, Reliance, Century. Forward transactions are allowed in these—the buyer can carry forward the transaction from one fortnightly settlement of outstanding transactions to another, sometimes for years together. 'B' group transactions, however, are on a cash basis, they cannot be carried forward from settlement to settlement but have to be completed within one settlement period. Clearly 'A' group securities have more scope for speculation and one way the powers-that-be try and cool the market down is to transfer scrips for the 'A' column to the 'B' column, as was done in TISCO recently.

How does a bull ride the wave up? He buys low and waits. When settlement day comes he can take delivery of the shares, which means that he will now hold shares valued at higher than the price he paid. If he doesn't have the money to take delivery or if he is very daring—nowadays the two go together—he can carry forward the transaction, paying another person contango charges ("badla" charges, in the vernacular) to put up the money on his behalf. These days, with hundreds of badlas every day, the badla financiers are making a packet. To cool the market down the authorities impose margins, which means that a percentage of the money involved has to be paid to the BSE. This is supposed to discourage overtrading and it does, but usually not fully. Recently the authorities could down the extremely volatile TISCO scrip only with an incredible margin of 100 per cent.

A bear rides the scrip on the way down by selling short, that is selling a scrip at say Rs 100—and hoping to buy it back when it touches, say Rs 80. His profit on a scrip which he may never have held in his hot little hands is the difference between the two prices. This is a tricky process sometimes: three years ago, a whole lot of bears got together to picnic off Reliance shares. The scrip, because it was a strong one and because there were three or four very obliging buyers who grabbed everything they could lay their hands on, kept rising. When judgement day arrived, the buyers demanded delivery and the bears had to scramble to collect shares at very high prices and lost quite a bit of fur in the process.

Most of the transactions are done between "jobbers"—brokers who stand on one spot in the ring and specialise in one or two securities—and brokers' clerks—who travel from jobber to jobber and place orders. Anything can start off a teji—a bull market—or a mandi—a bear market. TELCO stock rose by Rs 55 just on the news that it had entered into an agreement with Honda for cars. Orkay roared up to Rs 140 from Rs 90 in a matter of days simply because the company's annual meeting of shareholders is due—and despite the Rs 10.5 crore excise case, the company is embroiled in.

The one thing that can be said to determine the price of a share is the floating stock: that fraction of the equity capital of a company which is actually available for trading, and usually works out to 15 per cent of the equity capital. Otherwise, there is absolutely no way the price can be predicted. Last fortnight, for instance, with the income-tax raids on a few brokers' offices in the market, it was expected the shares would crash: they emerged stronger than ever.

Besides the transactions in the ring, brokers make money in outside trading. One way is by "arbitrage"—the buying and selling of securities between stock exchanges. Another is through kerb dealings—band ne bhao—dealings literally on the kerb outside. Once BSE Executive Director M.R. Mayya even had to go down to the kerb from his eyrie on the 25th floor to shoo away kerb brokers and impose heavy fines.

The world of the stock exchange is a hard one and it is also sometimes not very clean: settlements often take place at privately agreed prices, and it is now a new haven for black money. But there is one redeeming feature: very, very rarely has anyone reneged on his bargain. This is one place where one's word or just asserting the lift of a finger is still enough. —JAGANNATH DURASHI confidence about the economy being set for a take-off is now getting reflected on the stock-market.

Five years ago, Hindustan Lever could boast of having the largest number of shareholders among all companies in the country: 80,000. Today, the Gujarat Narmada Valley Fertiliser Corporation (GNFC) has 4.22 lakh shareholders, Reliance has 3.58 lakh shareholders and a total of 1.2 million investors (counting also those who hold the company's debentures and who have invested fixed deposits with the company), while a dozen other companies have more than a lakh shareholders each, including Lohia Machines, Gwalior Rayon, ITC, J.K. Synthetics, Ambalal Sarabhai, Indian Rayon, Lipton Tea and Glaxo Laboratories. Reliance alone has half as many investors as the total number of income tax payers in the country, and a couple of lakh shareholders in GNFC are farmers from the Gujarat countryside, introduced to the stock-market for the first time. Indeed, according to a study conducted two months ago by the Industrial Development Bank of India (IDBI), every eighth shareholder in the country today is a farmer. So the fever has spread to the rural areas as well.

Now, even as the Government views with satisfaction the broad-basing of share ownerships, its postal department is creaking under the strain of handling the gigantic mailing lists for company annual reports. Reliance Textiles has to distribute its annual reports through over a dozen post offices because no one office can handle the workload. And sometimes it is faster for the annual reports to be despatched from Bombay in trucks to other towns, where they are then handed in at the local post offices.

The share boom has resulted in numerous other spin-offs. Investment consultants have sprouted round almost every corner in the financial districts of the big cities, and investment journals crowd the news stands: Fortune India, Money Opportunities, Investment Today, Current Investments India and numerous others like Market Outlook, Corporate Panorama, Investment Bonanza, Market Trends and many more. There is also the promise of new investment companies and mutual funds that will undertake investment decisions on behalf of individual investors who may not be boned up on what is happening on the market. One such is the Hyderabad Investment and Financial Consultancy Corporation (HIFCO). Another company riding the crest of the wave is the Bombay-based J.M. Financial and Investment Consultancy Services, whose managing director Nimesh Kampani says he had five branch offices five years ago. Today, he has 14 and in the next two years he hopes to take that number to 50. "There are thousands of shareholders in small towns who have to be serviced," Kampani explains, adding that he expects the investor population to double in short order to 15 million. And Amrit Lal Bajaj, president of the Delhi Stock Exchange, has started ALB Trading Company to help small investors pool their resources and get substantial allotments on new share issues.

"The number of investors has gone up from 2 million to 7 million, and I expect this to grow to 15 million in the next few years."

NIMESH KAMPANI
Managing Director
JM Financial and Investment Consultancy Services

Such spin-offs can only multiply in an economy that now sees the middle class growing in size and financial clout, where urbanisation and the increasing economic surpluses accumulating in private hands provide the base for a more general acceptance of the joint stock principle that makes for public limited companies and stock exchanges.

N.J.Yasaswy, the Hyderabad-based share analyst, is one of several people who now see good times ahead. "The number of investors in the south has gone up four or five times in recent years, and it is becoming increasingly obvious to many prospective shareholders that returns from the stock-market are better than other investments." And the most significant finding of a survey of investors Yasaswy conducted in Hyderabad was that half of them were in the 31 to 45 age group, while another 16 per cent were in the 26 to 30 age group. Clearly, if the young are leading the headlong rush into the stock-market, the future can only be bright. Equally interestingly, Yasaswy's survey showed that more than half the investors had a monthly income of less than Rs 3,000.

Yet another finding of the IDBI study of investment patterns is that the salaried class now outnumbers the self-employed and professionals among the investing population. Now, with the Government talking of mandatorily offering company shares to employees in those companies the shareholding population could explode manifold yet again and lead to another quantum leap on the already booming stock-market.

If the entry of new classes of investors into the stock-market underlines the basic transformation of the share market, the history of this revolutionary development traces back to the late 1970s, when dozens of foreign-controlled companies were forced by the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act (FERA) to dilute their foreign shareholding by offering shares to Indian investors. This was invariably done at prices far below the ruling market rates for the concerned shares, and investors quickly sensed easy pickings and rushed in to buy a stake in such blue chip firms as Colgate-Palmolive, Hindustan Lever and some of the leading pharmaceutical firms. Many made instant money through these easy investments, and the shareholding population doubled overnight as the companies allotted their shares in small lots to an increasingly large numbers of investors.

If this whetted the appetite of numerous investors for the stock-market, the advent of the convertible debentures in the early 1980s marked a new phase of the boom. Convertible debentures are first-term bonds floated by companies at a specified rate of interest, with a part of the debenture value to be converted later into shares in the company. Thus, this investment instrument offered both an assured return (in the form of interest) plus the prospect of capital appreciation once the conversion to shares took place. In short, they were a surefire success, and the investors flocked in in droves once again. The debentures listed on the BSE totalled only Rs 671 crore in 1980. By 1984, this number had shot up to Rs 2,370 crore. During the same period, debenture grew on the Calcutta Stock Exchange from Rs 136 crore to Rs 623 crore, and on the Madras Stock Exchange from Rs 117 crore to Rs 746 crore.

Through this period, the Government itself took a series of bold and imaginative steps to boost the capital market. The maximum rate of interest on debentures was raised repeatedly so as to increase their attractiveness, and the same government that had banned forward (i.e. speculative) trading in 1969 allowed it once again two years ago. Further, companies were given permission to raise debentures for working capital, and then for investment in modernisation, and the norms governing the issue of these debentures were liberalised progressively.

All this marked a complete change in government attitudes from a decade ago, when the authorities had clamped down on the dividend freeze and restricted the issuing of bonus shares in their effort to hold the price line by reducing the quantity of money flowing into consumers' hands. Today, in sharp contrast, the effort consciously is to try and develop the private capital market further, to broad-base corporate shareholdings and to encourage companies to rely for funds on private investors rather than on the Government-owned financial institutions like the IDBI

Handy Signs

THE RING of the Bombay Stock Exchange is a kidney-shaped area which on good days accommodates up to 6,000 brokers and jobbers (people who trade in just one or two securities) buying and selling for all they are worth. When the heat is on and the din is deafening, communication in such places is largely a matter of signs. Also, with all brokers obsessed with secrecy, signs are perhaps the best way of keeping that secret.

The unmarked trading ring has a floor plan just as much as any carefully designed office. Shares on which forward trading are allowed are usually dealt with on the left of the ring, and cash scrips on the right. The leader in the former category, alphabetically as well as in terms of interest, is the Associated Cement Companies, or ACC, or "cement", or more graphically "murder"—because price movements in this volatile scrip can be murderous. The ACC jobbers stand in the centre of the ring, the TISCO people next to them, Reliance jobbers hang together at the side, and the rest are spread around. There is a fair amount of movement from one jobbing post to the other.

The signs are simple and made with such rapidity that few other than the two brokers involved actually catch on to the messages being exchanged in a fraction of a second. First, there are the quantity signs: the tip of the thumb resting on the first joint of the forefinger means one share, resting on the second joint means 10, and the entire forefinger equals 100 shares. One forefinger sticking up combined with an aggressive expression means 1,000 shares and the entire palm is 5,000 shares. The palm facing inwards is "buy" and facing out is "sell". Two palms facing outwards and waved frantically with little thought of secrecy is "sell, or I will have to jump off window sill." Waving palms must have been a common feature on the day of the great ACC crash last year.

The gestures that are combined with these to make up a complete transaction denote the scrips themselves and the signs for these vary, even changing from time to time. When a broker wants to buy 1,000 ACC shares, for instance, he might fleetingly touch his ear with one hand and make what seems like an obscene one-finger gesture with it half a second later, even as he looks like King Kong about to assault Jessica Lange. For Century Spinning, he will touch his clothes, for Tata Oil he'll rub his hands together, for Reliance he'll raise a fist, and so on. Some of the gestures are quite elaborate: a hand put on one's head, for instance, means TISCO because the company makes iron, which is black—black as the hair on the head.

People in the ring tell the rather apocryphal story of the innocent who wandered into the stock exchange as the guest of a broker, and then started talking animatedly. In less than the time it has taken to read this, he had started a veritable buying riot in a particular scrip. The odd thing is that in recent months even the hardened specialists have set off buying riots with little reason.

and the Industrial Finance Corporation of India (IFCI). As the Controller of Capital Issues, D.R. Mehta, said last fortnight, "Some kind of a bullish (upward) trend in prices is helpful for growth because more investment is attracted."

If the investing public has sensed this change of attitude and jumped into the market to take advantage, nothing has fired shareholders' imaginations as much as the economic policies of the Rajiv Gandhi Government. Virtually every half-way expert on stocks and shares attributes the unprecedented share boom of the last six months to a new confidence born out of the economic policies promised or followed by the new Government. Said Amrit Lal Bajaj: "The new Government is more pragmatic, so people feel that companies will now do better, and investor psychology has changed."

Perhaps this was inevitable. The Government has in recent months lowered income tax and wealth tax rates (leaving more money for investment in investors' hands), abolished the estate duty and the compulsory deposit scheme, raised the exemption floor under the monopolies act from Rs 20 crore to Rs 100 crore, announced hikes in the prices of steel and cement (boosting the shares of companies operating in these areas), liberalised licensing policies, put together a new policy package for the textile industry, delicensed major sectors of the drug industry, suggested in various ways that the private sector will now be the primary arm used for industrialisation (instead of the public sector, as in the past), and offered new avenues of growth for companies in almost every sector. Close to half the companies which earlier came into the net of the monopolies law are now out of it because of the asset floor being raised, and companies producing trucks can now produce cars. Thus, TELCO shares shot up merely on the announcement last fortnight of a collaboration agreement with Honda for producing cars.

Said S.L. Bardhan, president of the Calcutta Stock Exchange: "The latest stock-market boom is essentially because of the measures announced in the last budget, the lowering of taxes and the various reliefs offered to industry." Added a broker in Bombay: "Look at the way companies are expanding. Everyone is talking big, no one is planning investment of less than Rs 100 crore. And companies like TISCO are talking of investing a few thousand crores."

That is certainly true. Minoo Mody, director of several Tata companies, told a meeting of corporate financial experts organised by the Associated Chambers of Commerce and Industry in Bangalore last fortnight that TISCO alone could raise Rs 1,500 crore from the capital market in the next five years, and along with other resources finance investment of more than Rs 3,000 crore in one quinquennium. Even smaller corporate giants are talking a similar language of optimism: Chander Parkash, deputy managing director of the high-flying Orkay Silk Mills, said: "I can sell a Rs 3,000-crore Orkay project on the capital market tomorrow, if I need to." Considering that the total capital raised on the market this year will be around Rs 3,000 crore, this is a tall claim to make, but it reflects the new optimism in corporate financial circles, even as the realisation dawns that companies can now by-pass the banks and financial institutions and go directly to the capital market. Says Parkash: "I am talking of eliminating the banks as middlemen, and any intelligent industrialist can do this today. In a few years' time, more than Rs 5,000 crore will be raised on the capital market every year, against Rs 2,000 crore that was raised last year."

That might sound far-fetched, but R.K. Pitamber, finance director of Mahindra & Mahindra, who is otherwise sceptical of the recent share price boom, talks of a foreign bank opening a bank in Delhi, raising Rs 9 crore in deposits and then not finding good companies to which it could lend the money. "If companies continue to raise more and more money directly from investors, you might find more banks in a similar plight," Pitamber says.

Quite clearly, the share market boom and the minting of a new money machine has opened new doors for companies, encouraged corporate financiers to set their sights higher, and provided a new threat to an already burdened banking system by creating an attractive financial alternative to bank deposits. These and other far-reaching changes have now begun to be wrought in the economy in a manner that no one could have forecast even five years ago. And in a very fundamental sense, the private sector has come to resemble a public sector in the true sense of the term.

Other transformations have occurred too. As the investor response to new share issues sets into management consciousness, companies will increasingly seek to grow faster by going to the market for funds: privately held companies can cash in on the prospect of going public and overnight have their shares quoted at sky-high prices that automatically mean millions for the company's original promoters. Clearly, corporate thinking will adapt to the new reality of a large, powerful and responsive capital market. As Dhirubhai Ambani, chairman of Reliance Textiles, says: "If a company has the right pump, it can pump the money out of the people because the money is there."

Conversely, the growing shareholder awareness is already getting reflected in large attendances at companies' annual general meetings. Often times the questions are sharper and more pointed than during the ritualistic meetings of the past, and managements will soon find that they have to be more careful of shareholder criticism and public perceptions of their actions, for their future growth could be mortgaged by the shortchanging of shareholders. Indeed, if Reliance has one basic strength in relation to other companies, it is the iron faith that the investing public has in Ambani's desire to keep his shareholders happy.

Several factors have therefore come together in conjunction to bring about the stock-market boom: the entry of new classes of investors, non-resident money, confidence-boosting government policies, the growing awareness of companies themselves to the potential of raising more money on the stock-market, the lower tax rates, the broadening of the middle class base, the larger sums of disposable surpluses in private pockets, the emergence of shares as a hedge against inflation, and much more.

Black money too has started shifting into the stock-market, attracted by the quick gains available here. This, coming together with the inflow of non-resident money and the investments being made by new classes of people, has resulted in far more money chasing the same number of shares as earlier, leading to the price explosion of the last few months. Indeed, with large chunks of shares held by financial institutions and company promoters (the average for companies being around 70 per cent), the stock floating on the share market is often quite limited, so that even a modicum of buying could send share prices zooming.

"Black money is an evil, but if it comes into shares it is being put to productive use by supporting the corporate sector."

ARVIND C. DALAL
Member, Governing Board
Bombay Stock Exchange

"Brokers mislead their clients regarding the actual buying and selling price, and keep a part of the take for themselves."

ASHWINI WINDLASS
Corporate executive

As should be obvious, all these do not reflect entirely healthy developments. Although leading brokers like Arvind Dalal of the broking firm Chimanbhai Dalal argue that "Black money is an evil, but if it comes into shares it is being put to productive use by supporting the corporate sector," no share boom riding on an inflow of black money can be considered healthy. For one thing, this is hot money that can just as quickly be pulled out for investment in some other momentarily attractive area of enterprise. Such a development will inevitably bring about a price drop that could result in many small investors getting their fingers burnt. In fact, the current boom has swept up even dud shares in its wake: the closed Nilhat Shipping and the sick Rohtas Industries are two examples, and the extraordinary rise in the share price of companies like Jayant Vitamins and Uniscan and Unisonics are also inexplicable. The latter has shot up from Rs 13 to Rs 68 in short order, enabling investors like Chandigarh journalist Ravi Sidhu to make a quick killing. But as industrialist Surrendra Paul says, "Some people are being had."

If that is indeed the case, and a momentary slump results in even the small investors pulling out, the market could suffer a setback that will not be easy to recover from because the small investors may then need a great deal of coaxing to put their faith in the stock-market once again.

Increasingly, market observers are also realising the need for more effective regulation of stock-market functioning. Ram K. Piparaiya, who runs Aridhi Investments in Bombay, points out that much of the trading on the markets today is based on insider information that is denied to the ordinary investor. "The investing public must be informed of quarterly company performances, and of the volume of trading that is taking place, otherwise they can be misled," Piparaiya says. Ashwini Windlass, who has made a not so small fortune by investing in shares in the last three years, has another complaint that is commonly heard: brokers mislead their clients regarding the actual buying or selling price, keeping a part of the take for themselves, over and above the normal brokerage charges. Another investor talks of powerful brokers ganging up to force the market up or down, depending on their immediate interests, so that other innocent players on the market become unwitting victims of their machinations. Finally, independent observers of the market's operations point out that a good chunk of the business on the stock-market goes unreported because it is either done on the kerb outside the stock exchange building or conducted privately. Not only does this make any accurate monitoring of the market difficult, but control measures that the Government tries to impose are often rendered ineffective as a result.

There are yet other reforms required: the number of brokers operating in any stock exchange is far too small, but the broking community refuses to expand its numbers. Admits Amrit Lal Bajaj, "Brokers have a closed door club. It's like the MRTP law in operation here. Instead of 125 brokers in Delhi, there should be 1,000." Some of the dalals admit that investor-servicing is often quite poor. Says Arvind Dalal: "Brokers don't have enough space in the stock exchange building, and communications are always poor. So it can take several weeks to give an investor the shares he has bought."

There are virtually no effective penalties in existence at the moment for many of the malpractices that are commonplace on the stock-market. As Arun Bharat Ram, managing director of Shriram Fibres, points out, "Almost everyone indulges in insider trading, which would attract very severe penalties in any other country." And all too often the people who indulge in the malpractices are the ones who sit on the governing boards of the stock exchanges, so that no effective correctives are possible. On the New York Stock Exchange, in contrast, the president cannot be an active trader and the governing board is not dominated by brokers in the manner existent in India.

Some overdue reforms may come soon, after an official committee that is going into the stock-markets' functioning submits all its reports. And the Government may well be persuaded to exempt share investments from the capital gains tax, so that both individuals and institutions can buy and sell freely without worrying about tax problems. This will have the salutary effect of increasing the stock traded on the market and reduce the scarcity of floating scrips. Also, most investors do not in any case report their gains on the market to the taxman.

Meanwhile, despite the problems that investors have to face, the new appetite for shares remains seemingly insatiable. The Government has tried repeatedly in recent months to slow down the spurt in prices, which it sees as being unhealthily rapid, but nothing has been able to dampen the market. BSE Executive Director Mayya points out that he has imposed special financial margins on shares, suspended brokers for trying to evade controls, restricted trading in specified shares that were the most sought-after, and closely monitored the operations of the most active brokers in order to avoid the danger of a default in a volatile market where people might make financial commitments that they cannot keep. Yet, the market for a long time refused to recognise the restraints and merrily scaled new peaks of excitement, with even tax raids failing to dampen the enthusiasm for bidding prices up further. Nevertheless the signs are now there of the long-awaited stability in prices coming about, and the experts even forecast a slight dip.

"The investing public must be informed of quarterly company performances, and of the volume of trading, or they can be misled."

RAM K. PIPARAIYA
Proprielor Aridhi Investments

"Almost everyone indulges in insider trading, which would attract very severe penalties in any other country."

ARUN BHARAT RAM
managing director, Shriram Fibres

On balance, however, both brokers and investment analysts are confident that the boom will continue on a long-term basis. Amrit Lal Bajaj, points out that "Indian shares have been traditionally undervalued. In Japan, where shares are quoted at 50 times the net post-tax earnings of companies, TISCO would be quoted at Rs 5,000 per share instead of less than Rs 1,000 in Bombay." Also, as Bajaj's predecessor as president of the Delhi Stock Exchange, Harish Bhasin, points out, "Any company that is 10 years old has plant and machinery whose value on the market today will be four or five times the cost 10 years ago. This hidden financial strength does not show in the company's books, so the market price of the company's share must reflect this strength." That point is buttressed by Delhi investor Raj Kapoor, who points out that it would take Rs 700 crore today to set up a company like the Southern Petro-Chemical Industries Corporation (SPIC), which because of its low capital cost a decade ago has a share capital of only Rs 18 crore, but makes a profit of Rs 24 crore. Clearly, there is room for share prices to rise and reflect the true financial strength of such companies.

But another fundamental transformation has taken place on Indian stock-markets in recent years. Earlier, conservative investors used to judge the attractiveness of a share's market price in relation to the dividend rates that the company had been declaring. As everyone now knows, this is no way to assess a share's attractiveness, which depends essentially on whether its price is likely to rise or fall. The name of the game is not dividend yield but capital appreciation. And as Nimesh Kampani points out, "Unlike earlier, people are now looking for growth." In short, the attitude to the stock-market is now the one that will see it go places in the future. What has happened so far may only be the beginning of the ultimate flowering of Indian capitalism.

"Four years ago my mother tempted me to enter the kitchen, with a Gopi.
Yet today, I'm an expert cook... thanks to the super helpmate I have in Gopi."

"Gopi is all the help I need in my kitchen.
And do you know why?
Gopi offers me the latest technology and three jars with the basic machine — not just one. All at no extra cost.
So only Gopi lets me switch from blending... to dry grinding... to wet grinding to whatever... in seconds. With no hassles, such as fiddling with sharp blades.
Gopi also gives me the widest choice of optional attachments for special jobs. Each self-enclosed.
Come to think of it, Gopi does the work of a food processor, blender, juicer and grinder. Imagine the money I save by not having to buy them individually!
What's more, Gopi's heavy duty motor makes it the best machine for Indian conditions. In fact, I run it as long as I want. And the operating instructions are so easy to follow.
The Gopi machine is so good, you get lifetime free service.
What more could any woman want?
No wonder, with Gopi around I almost feel like a superwoman in the kitchen!"

COLOUR CONTEST '85

Every year, for the last three years, lakhs of children have participated with drawings and paintings... for attractive prizes. In the fun-tastic All India Camel Colour Contests, held at City, State and National levels.

Your child could be a winner. For he is competing with children of his own age, grouped by the classes they are studying in. So we have six groups: from kindergarten to Std. X with a special group for handicapped children.

Encourage your child to draw and paint. The exercise will help him in many ways. Because they call for close co-ordination of hand, eyes and mind, drawing and painting will make his hand more deft, his eyes sure and help him concentrate. All this will make him a better student.

VHSC

From the inventors of the VHS system here's yet another epoch-making technological break-through... VHS VideoMovie.

The VideoMovie is a Video Camera, Video Recorder and a Monitor, all in one compact single unit. And it weighs only 1.9 kgs.

It is the only compact video camera which is not only capable of live recording but also of instant playback through the camera viewfinder/monitor.

Moreover you can connect your VideoMovie directly to a T.V. and view your recording without using your VCR.

All that you do is just drop in a compact cassette, shoot like you would with a home movie camera and see the results in the electronic Viewfinder/Monitor or on your T.V.

All together now!

AFGHANISTAN

Deadlocked War

EARLY July, when the monsoon was still eluding sunburnt Delhi, Pakistan's elegant foreign minister had a 40-minute session with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, which Pakistani diplomats described as the most relaxed meeting between a Pakistan dignitary and an Indian premier in recent years. Among the issues discussed was Afghanistan. Sahebzada Yakub Khan gave the prime minister a report on Geneva-4, the fourth round of "proximity" talks between Pakistan and Afghanistan held in Geneva in June. The talks did not break the political crux of the Afghan problem. Yakub Khan told INDIA TODAY that much as Pakistan would like India to help open a channel of communication with Moscow, he did not specifically seek the prime minister's intervention in the slowly crawling political talks to settle the Afghan issue.

The Pakistani authorities realise that the time has come when Pakistan should talk directly to the Soviet Union, but they just do not know how to. Diplomatic channels do exist between the two capitals; there is also a tenuous mechanism of bilateral consultation: the foreign ministers of the two countries meet once a year to review the bilateral relationship, and a junior minister of the Soviet Government pays an annual visit to Islamabad to follow up the results of the review. But neither meeting took place last year as the Soviets took a darker view of the escalation of the level of weapons supplied by the US Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to the guerrillas in Afghanistan. Since Gorbachov's chilling monologue with General Zia-ul-Haq in Moscow last March, Soviet-Afghan military pressure on Pakistan has increased. This has created a certain nervousness in Islamabad, which manifested itself in the budget session of the Pakistan National Assembly. Members asked for a debate; the Government demurred. It was stated on behalf of the treasury benches that the foreign minister would "take the house into confidence" in a closed session. He did not. Prime Minister Junejo said in a statement that the Government would talk to the Soviets, but not to the Karmal regime in Kabul, which is what all political parties except the Jamaat-e-Islami want. General Zia himself conceded with unusual candour in an interview to a London-based journal that most political groups, some of the generals, and sizeable sections of the public did not support the government's Afghanistan policy.

After five years and seven months of bloody warfare, the overall situation appears to have tilted in favour of Moscow and Kabul. The Soviets are in control of all major and most medium towns. The rebels still operate in about 30 per cent of the Afghan rural terrain. In the other 70 per cent, neither side exercises firm control. The Soviet-Afghan forces now operate in strength in areas close to the Pakistani border, and the heat of battle frequently spills over to Pakistan.

In recent weeks, the Soviet-Afghan forces have stormed a main rebel outpost almost adjacent to the Pakistani border, built a "fortress" of their own, drawing an American protest, and—ominous for Pakistan in the long run—Kabul has decided "in principle" to close the border with Pakistan. This can be done only when the Pushtun tribes inhabiting the Afghan side of the border have ceased to fight against the Marxist regime. But as and when the Afghan Government closes the border, the chances of the three million refugees returning home will further fade away.

The biggest Soviet-Afghan gain is the resistance groups' failure to set up an alternative government on Afghan territory or even outside Afghanistan. The tribal and ethnic divisions of Afghans have stolen the resistance of its political substance. Even if fighting goes on in Afghanistan for a decade, the Karmal regime, protected by Soviet arms, will be there slowly and steadily gaining ground.

Americans realise the political war in Afghanistan has been lost, and the military war cannot be won. Donor fatigue has begun to set in. In conversations with the Soviets through official as well as informal channels, the Americans are throwing baits like "Finlandisation" and "tradeoffs", but Moscow is not biting. The Soviet line has hardened to a rigid immovable position: the situation in Afghanistan is not negotiable. What is negotiable is the "situation around Afghanistan".

During his Washington visit, Rajiv Gandhi was asked by Secretary of State George Schultz if he could help in breaking the deadlock in Afghan political negotiations. The prime minister's polite and candid response amounted to a simple 'no'. The main parties to the problem were Pakistan and Afghanistan and, he suggested, the two talk to each other directly. He had been assured by Gorbachov that the Soviet troops would pull out as soon as the CIA stopped supplying arms to the Afghan rebels and the US gave a guarantee of non-interference. The actual time-frame of withdrawal would be determined in a treaty Moscow would sign with Kabul.

This is a position that is unacceptable to the US. The Pakistanis scan the portents of the future with creased foreheads, and ask how the refugees will go back if Kabul doesn't have a stable government? How, they question, can Karmal stay in power if the Soviet troops pull out? To these and many other agonising questions there are still no answers. India will not help to find Moscow's answers; Pakistan is not going to even ask India to probe Moscow's mind on its behalf. Nor will Pakistan talk directly to Moscow because, as a Pakistani source put it, "the channels are there, but the language of communication is missing". This is where the Afghan tragedy has debouched after nearly six years of civil war. At the end of the tunnel: a faint Moscow-Kabul lamp blinking lamely on the deeply soured Saur Revolution.

BENJAMIN NETANYAHU

"Terrorism is a cancer"

ISRAEL'S Ambassador to the United Nations Benjamin Netanyahu at 35 is one of Israel's youngest diplomats. He is also one of its most effective. Netanyahu is a recognised expert on international terrorism. Before the world accepted that terrorism was anything other than an Israeli problem, he hosted a symposium in Jerusalem five years ago that foreshadowed the unfortunate events that have unfolded around the world. Netanyahu is the brother of the Israeli hero Colonel Jonathan Netanyahu, the ground commander of the Entebbe operation and Israel's sole casualty there.

Netanyahu is a hard liner in that he feels appeasement can never work and only resolute action is an effective measure against worldwide terrorism. He is forthright and honest. What follows is an interview between Netanyahu and our Washington Correspondent INDERJIT BADHWAR. It is the first ever given to an Indian correspondent.

The interview took a surprising twist when during its course, Netanyahu, fully aware of the political differences between India and Israel, called for cementing ties between the two countries. "We don't even ask India to accept all of our political positions," he said. Excerpts:

Q. What new developments have changed terrorism in the last five years?

A. Terrorism has become a weapon of warfare used by governments against governments, in that it is different from the work of individuals or groups. The main countries supporting terrorism are the Soviet bloc, including Cuba, and the radical Arab states and Iran, who are using it as an instrument of foreign policy. And the major targets have been democracies and countries aligned with democracies. Terrorist wars are shadow wars, the new wars.

Q. What countries are most susceptible?

A. Democracies and open societies are vulnerable because there are no barriers on movement or transfers of money, and there are few, if any, personal curbs on individuals. Totalitarian societies are not only able to squelch terrorism within their own borders, but also have a natural and philosophical alliance with terrorist groups.

Q. What are the real dangers of terrorism?

A. Terrorism obliterates the distinction between combatant and non-combatant. A child is seen as a potential soldier. A mother is seen as an enemy because she will give birth to a child. Their wars are waged in supermarkets, schools. While war is a tragic element of life, there are war crimes and they are not permissible. Terrorists deliberately choose women and children as targets because they are indefensible.

"In the face of terrorism, citizens have to be educated to be soldiers. Democracies must use the mass media and show the people what terrorist bombs and devices look like.

Q. What nurtures terrorism?

A. Terrorism grows by direct nurturing of class, political and religious conflicts. International terrorism has taken violent groups and internationalised the conflicts. For example, the PLO has offered arms and money and embassies for use by one side against the other in these conflicts—usually the radical left wing. But there are also right wing terrorist groups like the Mussolini Action Squads (Italian fascists). Why don't you hear about them? Because no mainstream governments have offered them any kind of support.

Q. What countries support international terrorism?

A. Syria, South Yemen and Iran espouse doctrines of terrorist states. They have their own terrorists plus they support international groups. They use terrorism as an instrument of warfare against other states. There are very few cases where a local terrorist campaign—if it is successful—remains local. A determined group can sustain a terrorist campaign only if it can find a host government to support it.

Q. How can governments fight terrorism?

A. Governments facing terrorism must educate their citizens to be ever vigilant. Straight terrorist actions deliberately and systematically damage civilians. Those people who turned on those radios which exploded in Delhi had nothing to do with the grievances the terrorists were fighting. This is what distinguishes the victim of terrorism from the incidental civilian casualties of war. For example, the RAF bombers against Gestapo HQ in Copenhagen in World War II missed the target and released their bombs on scores of children. That was an accident. It was not terrorism.

Q. What is the danger of world terrorism?

A. Terrorism is a cancer that spreads. If it is not stopped it spreads through the body politic and it destroys democracies. It is not a marginal threat to democratic societies. It undermines the faith of people in the Government and in the rule of law. It is a precursor of anarchism, and anarchism is the precursor of totalitarianism.

Q. Won't counter-measures destroy democracy?

A. Democracies are often paralysed by the thought that if they take steps against terrorism they will destroy democracy. That's not true. Italy, West Germany, Britain, Israel—exemplary democracies who have taken steps against terrorism—have maintained their civil liberties and the rule of law by taking vigorous action against terrorists.

Q. How can terrorism be fought?

A. In the face of terrorism, citizens have to be educated to be soldiers. Democracies must use the mass media—TV, radio—and show the people what terrorist bombs and devices look like. And governments must refuse as far as possible to yield to terrorist demands. Surrender produces more terrorism. Whenever possible, even in hostage situations, action must be taken to free the hostages even at considerable cost of life. Other steps include infiltration of terrorist groups through intelligence, disruption and sealing out of terrorist sanctuaries and concentrations before they can get you: Israel had a terrorist mini-state of 30,000 with a potential army of 60,000 in the north. Our cities were beginning to empty out because of indefensible danger from terrorists. In this case we had to pursue the terrorist threat outside our borders.

Q. Isn't there a danger of a wide war if terrorists are pursued across national borders?

A. It makes no difference if they are inside or outside the country. A government's primary duty is to ensure the safety of its citizens. If the terrorists are outside your territory that is controlled by a government either assisting the terrorists or is unable to control them, then you have every right and obligation for cross border attacks. Or if a foreign government is colluding with the terrorists—like Idi Amin, who was in cahoots with German and Arab terrorists (in Entebbe) then you should not be paralysed by a misguided absolutist concept of sovereignty. By doing so we're protecting the very countries who support shadow wars and are not themselves guided by this doctrine. There can be no paralysis. A democratic government has to establish the principle that terrorism is unacceptable.

Q. But terrorists claim they are justified because all other means have failed.

A. The moment you begin to rationalise the motives of people using terrorism you become open to further terrorism. Terrorism for any goal is unjustifiable. Nothing can justify blowing up the brains of a two-year-old girl, or blasting a bus full of schoolchildren. The minute you begin to make excuses, you paralyse yourself and lose moral authority. A democratic government must learn this lesson first.

Q. Is Israel now in a better position politically, for taking the stands that it has?

A. Throughout the decade of the '70s, Israel was isolated and ostracised. But it hasn't worked. We see a great improvement in Israel's international position in the 1980s. This is partly because of the decline of Arab oil power. There is now no fear of the oil embargo that was felt in Washington, Paris, Tokyo. Israel had been expelled from Africa because of Arab pressure and oil promises. But Israel is now coming back to Africa. The Arab threat is no real threat and the Arab promises were no real promises.

Q. Can you give some specifics?

A. Israel's aid and agricultural exports are now being sought increasingly in countries in Africa, Latin America and Asia. We now have diplomatic relations with 70 other countries and other formal relationships with a hundred more asking for economic, scientific and military cooperation. And the numbers are increasing every day. Every day of the week there is an approach to us being made by a new country. And this represents a dramatic change. Our decade of isolation is over.

Q. Any other reasons for this change?

A. Another reason for the change is the decline of the PLO. The blow they received in Lebanon not only destroyed their capability of terror against Israel, but also destroyed their position as a terrorist mini-state and their power to intimidate other Arab states. They no longer have this power of intimidation. Before Lebanon, the PLO had the aura of inevitability—the destruction of the State of Israel. This is no longer true. There is now set the stage for different movements for accommodation between Israel and its neighbours and the West Bank.

Q. How does this change Israel's global relationships?

A. This also means that internationally many other countries are no longer afraid of the oil threat and PLO blackmail. And this opens up new economic and political opportunities. We would like very much to expand ties with India. India recognises our right to exist. But we are now even getting approaches from countries that don't even recognise us.

Q. What common interests do you see between Israel and India?

A. India is a sister democracy. We admire India and its potential. There can be tremendous mutual benefits with closer ties. More and more countries are now acting in their own interests rather than placating Arab pressure. We don't even ask India to accept all our political positions. We have trade and economic relations with countries who have much less in common with us than does India. It's high time that Israel and India cement their ties.

INDO-PAK RELATIONS

Painful Progress

SOMEHOW, every bilateral contact between India and Pakistan seems to conjure up images of a pair of gawky teenagers on their first date: the same coyness and confusion, the hesitation and tentative groping and, of course, the mutual suspicion of intentions. Last fortnight's three-day meeting of the Indo-Pakistan joint commission in New Delhi, delayed a whole year by the traumatic occurrences in Punjab, was not all that different. Despite the ardent embraces at the airport and the engaging endearments expressed in the banquet speeches, the outcome of the exchange was hardly earth-moving in nature or content considering its relative insignificance in the context of the larger issues that continue to keep the two countries tantalisingly apart. "The outcome was as we expected in the sense that there was no progress on the major areas of disagreement," admitted a Foreign Ministry source.

Even the fact that Pakistan's military ruler, the enigmatic Zia-ul-Haq, had seen fit to telephone Rajiv Gandhi on the eve of the conclave, urging him to "give an energetic push to make the meeting a success" was ultimately pure political theatre. The Pakistan side, led by the redoubtable Foreign Minister Sahebzada Yakub Khan, had obviously left Islamabad with clear instructions on where to draw the line. Consequently, the areas of agreement; expansion of communication links, easing of restrictions for visitors on both sides, cooperation in the field of agriculture and the introduction of scholarships for greater academic intercourse in the field of higher studies, were all cosmetic cover that only succeeded in underlining the fact that at the moment, the only issues the two sides can progress on are purely non-controversial.

But in the larger historical context of Indo-Pakistan relations, the conclave was not all that fruitless. The very fact that the dialogue has been resumed must necessarily be the cause for subdued celebration. The onset of the crisis in Punjab coupled with Pakistan's accelerated quest for nuclear weapons status had reduced relations between the two neighbours to yet another dangerous low. The resurrection of the joint commission clearly implies that the two sides are ready to sup at the same table again, even if it means using extra-long spoons. That, in itself, is significant enough. The agreements signed, though minor in nature, also indicate that the scope of wider cooperation is still in existence, however distant its eventual realisation. "Our brief was to concentrate on consolidating the issues related to people. People impact on governments and the agreements signed are a useful step in the right direction," says a member of the Indian delegation.

Yakub Khan with Rajiv Gandhi: avoiding the crucial issues

That, however, is small consolation considering the fact that the Indian side entered the negotiations prepared to go much further but was stymied by Pakistan's stubborn refusal to get drawn into anything remotely sensitive. The Indian side, for instance, pressed hard for extending the agreement on railway bookings to include reopening the railway line from Munabao in Rajasthan to Khokhrapar in Pakistan's Sind district. The Pakistan side, obviously fearing internal interference from India in an area where the Opposition, especially the Pakistan People's Party, has a strong following, shot down the proposal. On a lower scale, the agreement on increased cultural exchanges was restricted by a rider that any Indian troupes would not include women, a reflection on the sensitivity of that particular issue in Pakistan. Again, when the Indian side reintroduced the idea of free exchange of newspapers and periodicals, it was met with stout resistance and the minor concession that it should be restricted to literary magazines. "We tried to convince them that it would lead to better mutual understanding between the people of the two countries, but obviously they feel this is something they are not ready for yet," says an Indian delegation member.

Surprisingly, Pakistan was also unusually defensive on an issue that India is seriously concerned about and affects both countries, namely, the dangerously high volume of narcotics flowing in and out of India and Pakistan. According to an Indian official present at the talks, the Pakistan side adopted the stand that they were not a producing country and therefore it was not their problem. "We tried to argue that it was a major problem for both of us. We even showed them evidence that they are in fact producing narcotics in large volumes but they were not very forthcoming," says the official. Ultimately, the two sides identified organisations that would in future cooperate in terms of exchanging information but Indian officials are rather sceptical of the outcome. In much the same fashion, the Pakistan side dug in their heels on the issue of increasing trade relations. Though Pakistan's reluctance is understandable when viewed in the context of that country's narrow industrial base as compared to India, during the talks, the issue was sidetracked on what seemed an unusually petty issue. The Indian side had produced what it called a Positive List which contains items that the two countries can trade in without upsetting any applecarts. Pakistan, however, insisted instead on having a Negative List, which would lay down items that would be barred from bilateral trade. The trade exercise, consequently, will have to wait for fairer weather before it can be aired again.

Against that restrictive backdrop, the real gut issues brought up in the private meetings between Yakub Khan and senior Indian officials, including Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and Defence Minister Narasimha Rao, had little chance of survival. Indian concern over Pakistan's nuclear programme was countered by the predictable proposal for a joint inspection of nuclear sites, something the Indian Government views with justifiable suspicion. And Pakistan's nuclear ambitions have currently become the crux of the entire security issue between the two countries which has seemingly bogged down over the semantic question of whether it should be a No War Pact or a Friendship Treaty. Significantly, as Rajiv subtly reminded Zia on the telephone, the day the joint commission met represented the 13th anniversary of the long-forgotten Simla Agreement. But as the attitudes of the two sides revealed, the chances of a security agreement, whatever fancy label it is given are still in the realm of make-believe.

Obviously, the joint commission is not destined to be the engine for improved relations. That will evidently have to await a higher level of contact. Yakub Khan expressed considerable optimism about the forthcoming meeting between the foreign secretaries of the two countries which will specifically discuss the security proposals put forward by the two sides. But again, the fact that Indo-Pakistan relations are, and always have been, precariously perched on a razor's edge, means that the slightest pressure —Pakistan's nuclear ambitions being one prime example—could once again bring the house of cards tumbling down.

The other dependency would necessarily be the internal situation in Pakistan and its future course. Rajiv Gandhi, on his part, has made regional amity the cornerstone of his foreign policy. According to members of the Indian delegation, the new Pakistan team under Yakub Khan is the best they have dealt with so far in terms of their understanding of Indian sensibilities and their collective determination to bestow the joint commission with some meaning. In Yakub Khan, Pakistan has a foreign minister of considerable prowess, stature and personality—he even has his sherwanis tailored at Saville Row, according to members of his own delegation. But Pakistan at the moment, in the words of a senior Foreign Ministry official, is "a halfway house". It is unclear just how sincere Zia is in his attempts to put on a more democratic face. It is equally unclear just how much power and influence Prime Minister Mohammed Junejo really wields, and, by extension, the National Assembly which has just completed its first session without achieving anything of note. For that matter, it is also unclear whether Yakub Khan himself is in a position to influence Zia and his generals on issues that affect Indo-Pakistan ties. In that situation, the achievements of the joint commission last fortnight represent a miniscule and hesitant step forward. The giant leap that is required to bridge an ancient animosity is still a dark smudge on the distant horizon and at the moment its contours are suspiciously shaped like a mushroom.

SRI LANKA

Search for a Solution

IT WAS a singular honour to be a royal guest at Thimpu, the capital of Bhutan, last fortnight, just as it was a misfortune to be a journalist or a tourist. In preparation for the historic Sri Lanka peace talks which began in the Himalayan kingdom on July 8, Thimpu had been tightly and effectively sealed off for all visitors except those participating in the talks. Madras correspondent S.H. VENKATRAMANI who managed to arrive in Thimpu as a tourist, was unceremoniously woken up in the middle of the night and politely told to leave the country. However, he did manage to obtain exclusive details of the negotiations and the crucial role being played by India in the peace process before leaving. His report:

THE SETTING was totally in keeping with the occasion. Secluded from the rest of the world in the quiet splendour of Bhutan's fairy-tale capital, the 28 members of the official delegation to the Sri Lankan peace talks were given red carpet treatment. The 10-member Sri Lankan delegation led by President J.R. Jayewardene's brother, Hector Jayewardene had the elegant 46-roomed Motithang Hotel, perched atop a hill with the capital sprawling below and the majestic spread of the Himalayas behind, all to themselves. The 13-member Tamil delegation comprising two members from each of the five Tamil liberation groups (four comprising the Eelam National Liberation Front (ENLF) and the fifth being the People's Liberation Organisation of Tamil Eelam, three top representatives from the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF), and the five Indian officials were accommodated in the equally luxurious and scenic Royal Kuengacholing guest-house.

The talks themselves—the first time in recent Sri Lankan history that official representatives of the Sri Lanka Government were sitting at the same negotiating table with some of the most wanted Tamil militants who have been waging a decade-old war for a separate Tamil Eelam—were held at the exquisitely designed Banquet Hall with gleaming chandeliers casting a benign glow over the proceedings. Surrounding the hall were blue-coated members of the Bhutanese police. As one of the organisers remarked: "Even a bird cannot enter without an official invitation." The ceremony and secrecy were inevitable though at least one delegation, the Tamil militants, were rather reluctant receivers of royal hospitality. The Tamil group, consisting of the eight representatives of the ENLF—Anton and Tilakar from the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, Madi and Mohan from the Tamil Eelam Liberation Organisation, L. Ketheeswaran and Varadaraja Perulam from the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front and Rathnasabapathy and Rajee from the Eelam Revolutionary Organisation of Students—had been virtually frog-marched to the talks by the Indian Government. But the reluctance of the delegates to say anything openly critical of the Indian Government was clear enough indication that they had little choice in the matter. "India has always supported the cause of the Tamils and support is crucial to us," says Professor Balasingham, the Madras-based spokesman for the LTTE.

However, there was also no denying that deep down, the militants feel that India has let them down. Admits S. Sivanayagam of the Tamil Information Centre: "The militants are certainly very depressed and demoralised." That basically stems from the realisation that the new Government in New Delhi has not taken kindly to the Eelam liberation struggle and certainly will no longer allow it to be launched from Indian soil. In fact, the Thimpu talks were agreed to be aimed at finding a lasting political solution to the problem within, as the Indian Government says, "the framework of a united Sri Lanka" which is in itself a negation of the Eelam liberation ideal. In fact, when the Thimpu talks were officially announced, the militants had declared that they would boycott the talks and in a press release, the ENLF claimed that the Sri Lankan security forces were violating the unilateral 12-week ceasefire declaration announced by Sri Lanka last month. They had also demanded certain preconditions for the talks which had not been forthcoming.

But when the ENLF leaders arrived in New Delhi to explain their stand, they were told by officials of the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW) and the defence and external affairs ministries that they had no option but to attend the Thimpu deliberations. On the question of the ceasefire violations, the Indian Government assured them that they would bring pressure to bear on Colombo to ensure that it would be observed. The militants also objected to the presence of the TULF and PLOT who have not been party to the armed struggle but were overruled. Neither did the Indian side give in to their request to postpone the talks by three or four weeks so that a common strategy could be formulated.

At Thimpu, even though the militants sent their second rung leadership since Sri Lanka had no ministerial representation there, they were given short shrift. They were not allowed to meet any outsiders or make phone calls and were virtually held as hostages. They were told that the talks could go on for 10 days or more and that apart from discussing the ceasfire they would have to listen and react to the Sri Lanka Government's proposals to settle the Tamil issue once and for all. But, according to inside sources, the proposals themselves were not much different than those put forward at the All Party Conference in Colombo last year. These included the scheme to form district councils in all the 24 districts of Sri Lanka; that the chief ministers and other ministers of the councils would have no executive powers of their own and would be appointed by the President. Even the legislative powers of the councils would be limited with the provision for two or three councils joining together to form an inter-district provisional council. When they were brought up last year, the proposals had been rejected by even the moderate TULF.

The militants, on their part, raised preliminary objections to the presence of Sri Lankan military intelligence personnel in the delegation. They also protested about the restrictions on Indian media personnel when the Sri Lankan papers were carrying detailed and accurate accounts of the negotiations every day thanks no doubt to telephone calls to and from Thimpu. At one stage, the militants threatened to walk out of the talks in protest against the unacceptability of the district council proposals but were persuaded to remain by the Indian officials present who were obviously there for that very purpose. "Object if the proposals are unacceptable but at least continue the negotiations," they were told. TULF leader A. Amrithalingham also voiced his party's objection to the district council proposal and declared that they had only come to Thimpu in the hope that the Sri Lankans would come up with fresh proposals.

But along with the stick were also some carrots. Hector Jayewardene announced that 643 of 1,197 Tamil detenus in Sri Lanka were being released and the cases of others would be referred to the attorney-general. Again, when the militants objected to Sri Lanka Radio characterising them as "terrorists" participating in the Thimpu talks, Jayewardene agreed to send a message to Colombo to stop such references. The militants also succeeded in registering their suspicion that the Sri Lankan Government was utilising the ceasefire period to consolidate military position by the purchase of four helicopter gunships from Pakistan and 18 gunboats from China. But perhaps the greatest gain for the militants was the fact that their presence at Thimpu conferred recognition and legitimacy on them as opposed to their being dismissed as terrorists.

That, however, was cold comfort in the face of the fact that the militants had been virtually forced to come to Thimpu in the first place by the Indian Government and establish some kind of a negotiating position even if it was a loose understanding which could be used as a basis for subsequent discussions. But it was also clear that any such patchwork deal would hardly find popular agreement within the ranks of the militants or the Tamils of Sri Lanka. Neither would any major concessions by the Sri Lankan delegation find favour with the hardline Sinhalese back in Sri Lanka.

Meanwhile, four days after the talks started, the alleged attempt by Tamil militants to assassinate President Jayewardene in Colombo added a dramatic new twist to the talks. Initial reports said that the two militants caught trying to plant a bomb timed to go off when Jayewardene was scheduled to arrive at the presidential secretariat, belonged to the Eelam Revolutionary Organisers (EROS), one of the groups represented at the Thimpu talks. However, its fallout on the talks itself may not be that damaging. Indications are that the incident was intended to disrupt the talks but the Indian government reacted promptly by dispatching foreign office firefighter Romesh Bhandari to Thimpu to ensure the talks went on and the militants arrive at some kind of settlement.

But despite the Indian Government's zeal and determination, the Thimpu talks were clouded in uncertainty and it was clear that if the militants in Madras decided to abandon their sanctuary in India and head back to Sri Lanka to resume the battle in the enemy camp, India's leverage would vanish yielding perhaps to battles even more bloody and destructive than before.

Novopan presents all the excitement of Executive Class!

Was it the airlines who decided that the executive deserved to be put in a separate class?

It doesn't really matter who started it. The fact is that most companies today treat it as a ground rule.

So who adds this touch of class?

Perhaps there's no candidate for the job with as much around potential as Novopan. Novopan is the only pre-laminated particle board in the country. It's pre-laminated on two sides. Ready for the job.

This means your office panelling can go up almost overnight.

There's no disruption of work. And look at the choice. A range of wood finishes — teak, rosewood, oak... whatever you would! As well as a variety of colours and designs.

For doors too, there's nothing like it. You can order just the size you need. And shut the door on the problem!

Novopan is great for tables, cabinets, bookshelves... everything. You can choose between regular Novopan and phenol-bonded Novopan Exterior. So you can use it indoors and outdoors.

And here's the final qualification to clinch the appointment.

Novopan doesn't cost the earth. As a matter of fact, it costs less than those one-sided laminate and plywood combinations.

Novopan — for all the excitement of Executive Class.

Best & Crompton

Best & Crompton Engineering Ltd., a multi-product diversified organisation based in Madras has seen rapid growth over the past few years leading to sales exceeding Rs. 120 crores in 1984, together with a national and international reputation as a professionally managed Company known for its reliability and service to customers. As part of its development plans, this Company is in the process of finalising Agency agreements with leading foreign manufacturers of sophisticated equipment for:

- Cable Manufacturing
- Earth Moving
- Materials Handling
- Large Power Plants
- Machine Tool accessories

In order to make these plans operational, Best & Crompton have retained ESQUIRE CONSULTANTS to recruit top flight, career-minded professional Managers and Engineers for the following positions:

GENERAL MANAGER

The incumbent will head this new Division and be responsible for its profitability, growth, diversification and negotiations, not only for new Agency agreements with principals in the developed countries but also for individual contracts whose values could be in the range of US $ 5 million. Career advancement prospects for the selected person are excellent.

Suitable candidates for this position will be engineering graduates with management qualifications and a proven track record in the management of Agency Sales. The preferred age group is 40-45 years, but this could be relaxed in exceptional cases.

Apart from qualifications and experience, this position calls for a person with leadership qualities, high achievement motivation and a capacity to develop and lead a team of professionals.

SENIOR MANAGERS

Incumbents will head one or more product groups and report to the General Manager of this Division. The main responsibilities of persons selected for these positions will be that of ensuring profitability and development of business on an all India basis and also leading a team of Marketing and Service Engineers located at strategic areas so as to be of service to customers.

These managers will be engineers with qualifications in Business Management having a thorough knowledge of import and licencing procedures. They will be in the age group of 35-40 years with at least 5 years' experience in Agencies' business in a large national or multi-national organisation.

SERVICE ENGINEERS

Since service to customers is an important factor in all areas of Best & Crompton's operations, several Service Engineers with experience in installation and servicing of large, sophisticated equipment marketed by this Division are also required. For these positions, not only is proven competence essential but also a great degree of mobility. Knowledge of more than one Indian language will be an advantage.

Compensation: Salaries and allowances will be negotiated at levels consistent with qualifications and experience. However this factor will not hinder the recruitment of the right persons.

Foreign Training: In order to obtain maximum knowledge and familiarisation of products handled by this Division, selected persons should be prepared to accept short-term training in manufacturers' works in foreign countries.

Persons interested in these challenging career-oriented positions are invited to send — within 10 days — their bio-data, details of experience, current emoluments and a short review of their career objectives to:–

MAKING WAVES

MANOHAR Rajaram Chhabria, who has created waves in Indian industry with his acquisition of major chunks of shareholdings in Shaw Wallace, Dunlop India and Bayer India, is now coming on to the board of the high-flying Orkay Silk Mills. Orkay is now thinking of diversifying into electronics from synthetic textiles. Chhabria has considerable marketing and manufacturing experience in this field, since his Jumbo Electronics sells Sony products in West Asia, while another company in India makes television sets and other consumer electronics goods.

Meanwhile, Chhabria is believed to be planning two new headline-hitting moves. One is a proposal to join hands with Sony to make colour television sets in India, and another is a reported bid to acquire major shareholdings in five pharmaceutical companies. Some share brokers in Bombay have reportedly been given blanket instructions to buy till the required stake is acquired.

BLEAK PROSPECTS

ENGINEERS India Ltd (EIL), the giant public sector engineering consultancy company that employs thousands of engineers, could be heading for hard times because of the doubts over the money being available for two giant refinery complexes at Karnal (in Haryana) and Mangalore (in Karnataka). Several other projects being handled by EIL are now in their closing stages as far as EIL's role is concerned, and new orders are proving scarce. The only ray of hope at the moment is the giant Maharashtra Gas Cracker Complex. Nevertheless, the company's profits in relation to turnover dipped last year, and the turnover itself could dip in the near future. Employees argue that a long overdue revision of pay scales is being held in abeyance because of the uncertain future.

FRONT RUNNER

RELIANCE Textile Industries seem to be on the aggressive look-out for new projects over and above the handful it already has on its plate for the next three years. The company's Chairman, Dhirubhai Ambani, is making a serious bid to locate a synthetic yarn unit in Uttar Pradesh. The competition for the licence is provided by the JK Singhania group, who were at one stage ahead of Reliance in the race for the project. But Ambani seems to have moved the levers of power effectively to emerge as the front runner at the moment. Meanwhile, key Reliance executives have also been looking for investment opportunities in West Bengal. If any of the projects materialise Reliance will have begun shifting its investments from western India to other parts of the country.

TRANSFER TRAVAILS

PROBLEMS continue to dog the arrangements worked out for the transfer of technology from the United States to India. Although a memorandum of understanding was signed on the issue shortly before Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi visited the US last month, this seems to have been limited to a broad agreement on the principles of technology transfer, with the details yet to be worked out on some of the contentious issues involved. For instance, the US has been insisting that the computers imported into India must not be used for defence and atomic energy programmes. The Government of India has not given in on this issue, and a final agreement is yet to be hammered out.

LAGGING BEHIND

INDIA continues to bring up the rear in global economic indicators. The latest World Development Report, published by the World Bank, places India 14th from the bottom in terms of per capita income ($ 260 in 1983), below China (19th with $ 300) and Pakistan (27th from the bottom, with $ 390).

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

Some of the comparisons may not be fully valid because of distortions caused by fluctuating exchange rates, but India's annual per capita growth of GNP is 1.5 per cent, lower than both China (4.4 per cent) and Pakistan (2.5 per cent). But India's growth performance is significantly better than the average of low income economies excluding China and India.

JINXED PROJECT

THE NAGARJUNA group's effort to get ahead with the Rs 550 crore Nagarjuna Fertiliser project seems to have run into some unexpected hurdles. The joint project, jinxed for many years because partners like the Birlas and Shaw Wallace pulled out, seems to have run into trouble yet again: the Government has yet to clear the foreign collaboration with Snamprogetti of Italy, the controller of capital issues has yet to give the green signal for the raising of capital, and the financial institutions have not yet committed any loans. Meanwhile, anonymous letters have started reaching the Government and the financial institutions, questioning the managerial and financial ability of the Nagarjuna group in relation to the size of the project. These may or may not be authored by rival companies. But the group has, meanwhile, attracted considerable flak for allowing brokers to raise funds from the general public as a part of the promoters' share of the new venture's equity capital.

The Twisted Trail

"The preliminary investigations made so far (by the CBI) shows that the amount of total fraud may run into $1,000 million."
—K.C. Lohia, Metropolitan Magistrate on March 1985

"Investigations carried till date... are that Rajendra Singh Sethia had defrauded London-based nationalised banks... to the tune of $146 million."
—S.M. Agarwal, Add. Sessions judge on March 27, 1985

"The chargesheet which has been filed in the present case relates to offences committed in respect of these transactions involving $10.4 million."
—D.P. Wadhwa, Delhi High Court judge on June 17, 1985

THE TUNE, it appeared, was changing fast. And far from building up to a dramatic crescendo, as it should have, it seemed rapidly to be degenerating into a mass of discordant noises. There was a strange irony to it all. In the dock was the biggest bankrupt in British history, the London-based Rajendra Sethia, who is alleged to have defrauded the London branches of three giant Indian public sector banks of several crore rupees. Ranged against him were the sleuths of the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) and top functionaries of the Reserve Bank of India (RBI) who, after four months of painstaking investigation, had only questioned scores of witnesses but had pored over literally trunksfull of documents, a process they were still far from completing.

Yet, when Sethia's interolcutors finally filed their charges in a Delhi Court at the end of June, the high expectations case seemed to deflate almost audibly. If the chargesheet against Sethia and fellow accused Amarjeet Singh, the dismissed general manager of the Punjab National Bank branch in London, and supporting

INTERVIEW

"I have done nothing illegal"

HE USED to shuttle between London and Lagos, Zurich and New York. Today, he shuttles once a fortnight between New Delhi and Calcutta escorted by four policemen. But Rajendra Sethia, the flamboyant entrepreneur currently lodged in Delhi's Tihar Jail, still believes in maintaining the style "I am used to." He flies executive class at his own expense and also pays the fare for his advocates and his four police escorts.

Since his incarceration for alleged fraud and bankruptcy earlier this year, the tall, bearded figure dressed in the jeans and striped shirts he favours has become familiar to millions. "I think I am the second best known person after Rajiv Gandhi," he says with a laugh, referring to the excessive attention and hushed whispers that he receives from his co-passengers. Last fortnight, Assistant Editor PRABHU CHAWLA found himself sitting next to Sethia on one of his trips to Calcutta where his legal battle is going on. During the flight, Sethia, after some persuasion, agreed to grant what is his first ever interview to an Indian journalist since he fled Britain in 1984. Excerpts:

Q. How do you feel about this temporary change in your role, from a jet-set high-profile entrepreneur to an ordinary prisoner in Tihar Jail?

A. Frankly, I never expected to land up in a prison. I was not prepared for it either. But it is an interesting experience which I will not forget. At the same time I would not like this to be repeated.

Q. Who do you blame for your current predicament?

A. Primarily, I hold my karma responsible for sending me to jail. But it is also due to the conspiracy of circumstances which outmanoeuvred me and here I am. To begin with it was a coup in Nigeria, followed by a change of government in Sudan and finally the glare of publicity in which I found myself in India and abroad. And it started with a very hostile coverage of the Central Bank of India in your magazine in 1984.

Q. Do you really believe that media exposure has contributed to your downfall?

A. I firmly believe that I am a victim of excessive and adverse publicity. I must confess that it was my inexperienced youth during which I never realised that one required both, a powerful political umbrella and friends in the press to survive in business life.

Q. But it is widely believed that you had powerful connections in Mrs Gandhi's government and the bureaucracy.

A. This is all bunkum and nonsense. I never met any of the ministers in Mrs Gandhi's or Rajiv Gandhi's government. Although I have maintained a low profile as a businessman and dealt with officials who were directly concerned with my business activities, I wish I had known some politicians and escaped from this traumatic experience of my life.

Q. You mean you succeeded in taking huge loans from Indian banks without any clout or influence?

A. They gave me every penny on the basis of my track-record and security. If you look at their profitability, you will find it was due to Esal's that they made huge profits from 1979-83. I have done a business of about $1,000 million with Indian banks. With that huge cash flow and regular payments, any bank or financial institution would have kissed my feet for getting my accounts.

BHAWAN SINGH

Sethia with his police escorts: trials and tribulations documents are any indication, the CBI has a long way to go before it can make its case stick.

Says Sethia's Calcutta-based counsel, R.K. Khanna: "Sethia has undoubtedly been indicted in the media, but the CBI has not lived up to its promise of unravelling the alleged conspiracy." CBI officials declined to comment because, as one said dismissively, "till our investigations are complete we don't want to get involved in this controversy."

The first tell-tale signs emerged from a comparison of the five-page charge-sheet submitted to the court on May 28 and the first information report (FIR) lodged against Sethia last March. The FIR had said specifically that:

► certain officials of the Punjab National Bank (PNB) and the Central Bank of India based in London had conspired with Sethia to defraud these banks of 'millions of pounds sterling'.

► Sethia obtained huge loans by falsely representing his assets to these banks.

In comparison, the CBI's chargesheet in court—filed just one day before the expiry of the statutory 90-day deadline—seeks conviction on an alleged fraud of $ 10.4 million (Rs 13 crore). The chargesheet says that the Sethia-Singh conspiracy to defraud PNB was hatched in November 1983. Singh, it says, was personally supervising Sethia's accounts to help out Sethia's Esal Commodities, which was in financial difficulties.

The CBI rests its case on four bills of exchange worth $10.4 million drawn on the Hong Kong-based Alglobe Trading Ltd, another Sethia company, relating to the supply of sugar to Nigeria. The bills, which were offered up to the bank, remained unpaid and later turned out to be fake. The CBI also says that the bills were later transferred with PNB approval to another Sethia company floated in Hong Kong simply to accept the bills, but once they were presented, the company's directors were found to be untraceable.

Sethia argues that there was no fraud since no money was actually paid out by the bank against them. But the CBI's chargesheet shows that the day after the bills were received on December 6, 1983, the bank reduced the debts outstanding against the Esal group from $33.263 million to $23.259 million. At the same time, in a clever move to paper over this, Sethia's total advances were shown to have gone up by a precisely similar amount

Q. There are allegations that you overstated the inflated value of your securities and presented fake documents to secure loans.

A. Let us wait for the trial to begin. My assets have been undervalued. Moreover, evaluation has been done by independent people in UK and not in India. The Central Bureau of Investigation is after my blood now because it has found nothing substantial against me. They began with £ 1,000 million (Rs 1,600 crore) and have come down to $ 7 million (Rs 8 crore). I have not done anything which is illegal, unethical or even wrong by any standards and I am committed to repay everything which I owe to anybody in the world. I have done it in the past. I will do it again.

Q. But once you are declared bankrupt you are under no obligation to pay anybody.

A. True. But I don't want to carry the stigma of a debtor. I may die but my children will suffer from it. I am an Indian and a Rajasthan Marwari. Since I am proud of being a Marwari, I will ensure that I will die with my own money.

Q. How much time do you think it will take you to clear all the debts?

A. It depends upon the progress of the cases I am involved in. Let them release me today, I will clear everything within 24 months, sitting in India. My first priority is Indian banks because their credibility in Britain is at stake now. After their money is over, I will settle scores with the British police who dragged me into this controversy due to ethnic considerations. They could not tolerate Indians flourishing and giving jobs to them in Indian-companies.

"Let them release me today, I will clear everything within 24 hours, sitting in India."

Q. But why did you come to India when you knew that the new Government was after you?

A. I never expected that I would be arrested in India. They were talking to me till February. Representatives of the Reserve Bank of India and other Indian banks were involved in a rescue package. If I had the intention of defrauding the banks, I would have gone to Brazil or any other country. Nothing would have happened. I came here because I meant business but it was not to happen.

Q. But they have got you and may recover the money too.

A. They will get the money because my securities are sound. There may be a shortfall of a few million pounds which can be made up if I am in business. But keeping me in jail is not a solution.

Q. You seem to be feeling very uncomfortable in jail.

A. Not any more. After four-and-a-half months I have become used to my new abode. But I miss my children and family members. Now I am in the company of VIP prisoners and get legal facilities. I miss nothing except my family and travelling from one country to another in search of customers and clients.

Q. Do you intend to write a book on the saga of the world's biggest bankrupt?

A. I have found place in the Guinness Book of World Records due to the Punjab National Bank which clamped a claim of $ 92 million which was fully secured. I have not given any thought to it. Charles Sobhraj, who is also in Tihar Jail, has offered me a multi-million dollar contract. But I am a salesman and not an author. I want to get back to my job and prove that Sethia is not a scoundrel, a crook or a dishonest businessman.

—in spite of the fact that no money had been received from Hong Kong and the bills were fake. The CBI concentrated on this case after Sethia—who describes these entries as "only book adjustments"—reportedly disclosed to his interrogators that he had once submitted forged bills and Singh had, in fact, accepted them.

Amarjeet Singh

One reason why the CBI seems to have retreated from its earlier position seems to be the reluctance of the bank concerned to give up their efforts to recover their money. While the CBI has been pursuing a conviction, the banks are after the money they stand to lose. According to claims filed with Cork Gully, a reputed London-based firm of official liquidators appointed by a London court, PNB currently has $92.73 million (Rs 115 crore) outstanding, the Central Bank $51 million (Rs 60 crore) and the Union Bank of India $17 million (Rs 21 crore). Interestingly, none of these banks have lodged criminal complaints, and the documents they have handed to the CBI seek to show that there is no-thing wrong with their Sethia accounts. The CBI has gone into the case under instructions from the Finance Ministry.

The bank's gamble seems to be paying off. According to information obtained by INDIA TODAY, the banks have made some progress in making good their losses. It is now clear that some 90 per cent of the outstandings relate to Esal's business with Nigeria and Sudan. Of the $95 million payments due from these countries, some $65 million are covered by Lloyds insurance and over half has been paid to the creditor banks. PNB, for example, received 30 million in April against total dues of $53 million. The second instalment has not been paid out because Sethia is in detention in Delhi and Lloyds is entitled to a discussion with the party concerned before it releases payments. In fact, soon after Sethia's arrest, two representatives of Lloyds came to Delhi in March and moved the court for an interview with Sethia which the CBI opposed.

While Lloyds have now formally protested to the banks about their inability to meet Sethia, the banks have started to get their money out of Sudan. Some $20 million (Rs 25 crore) had been paid till July 7, and the authorities in both countries have written to the liquidators to say that they are rescheduling the payments.

At the same time, the Indian banks have started to sell various securities lodged with them by Sethia in order to recover their loans. But since they must first secure the permission of the court in London, the recovery is relatively slow. There are other problems. Sethia owns over 13 lakh shares in Jokai India Ltd, a tea concern. PNB sought the transfer of these shares, which are worth Rs 18 crore, in its favour but the company refused. Last month, PNB moved the Finance Ministry to intervene so that it could offload the shares and recover the money.

LATEST POSITION OF SETHIA'S ACCOUNTS

As on March 31, 1985, in $ million.	Punjab National Bank	Central Bank of India	Union Bank of India	Total
Total Outstandings	92	51	16.9	159.9
Secured	91	27	14.0	132
Unsecured	0.9	24	2.9	27.8

The bank is also attempting to sell Holland Hotel in New York, another property owned by Sethia and mortgaged to PNB for $6 million (Rs 7.5 crore). According to a report by Ferguson Maidment & Co, chartered accountants retained by PNB to make an independent assessment of Esal's financial accounts, the hotel's assessed value today is $7 million but PNB last month received an offer of $12 million (Rs15 crore) from a New York broker. But the London court has refused permission to sell because it believes a still higher price can be obtained.

Ferguson Maidment have also reported that PNB isn't in the tight spot its large outstandings would seem to indicate. PNB's advances were more or less fully secured. The chartered accountants say that "based on summary, the estimated net deficiency is $99,840 (Rs 12.5 lakh)" which is small change considering PNB's total unrecovered outstandings.

It is the other two banks that are in difficulty. The only good news for the Central Bank is the availability of $5 million that it will receive from the sale of Holland Hotel in New York. Another $2 million has been received from the Nigerian authorities, but the official liquidator suggests that some 25 per cent of its advances were not properly secured and may not be recovered. The Union Bank too is left with a similar 25 per cent of its advances unsecured, but it is likely to receive about $10 million from Nigeria.

The CBI realises that as more money flows into the coffers of the banks, its case will become progressively weaker. Failing to come up with more concrete evidence at the moment, the CBI has created a problem for PNB which has not been able to reply to a notice filed by Singh challenging his dismissal. Singh was removed from service on March 15 because of his alleged role in the Sethia advances, but the Delhi High Court admitted Singh's petition and gave PNB till July 9 to reply to it —which it has not done.

In his petition, Singh argues that his branch did not commit any fraud, that the bank authorities, RBI and the Central Government were all kept fully informed of its actions. Moreover, he points out that it was the Government and the RBI which launched a fiscal operation to rescue Sethia by which the banks were to advance another $40 million (Rs 50 crore). The operation never went through because of the liquidation order passed by the London court.

Meanwhile, concern is growing among banking circles that the longer the Government takes to bring the guilty to book, the more is the loss of confidence in Indian banks abroad. Already deposits in the London branches of Indian banks have declined 20 per cent in the last 20 months, and the Central Government has withdrawn loan sanctioning authority of local branch managers. Says a dejected London-based official of an Indian bank: "Every day we receive a telex from Delhi about someone or other arriving to investigate. Are we to do business or keep answering questions?" Clearly, the guessing game isn't likely to be over in a hurry, not till the Sethia trial remains unconcluded.

REVENUE DEPARTMENT

Tightening Up

WHAT does a finance minister do when he has a budget deficit of over Rs 3,000 crore, and when the deficit threatens to get still bigger because of lackadaisical tax collection? The answer came last month when Vishwanath Pratap Singh undertook the most comprehensive shake-up the Government's tax collection machinery has seen in the last 40 years.

The headline-hitting moves Singh ordered the transfer of all but one member of the Central Board of Excise and Customs (CBEC), including the board chairman, inducted three new members on to the Central Board of Direct Taxes (CBDT), superseded 20 senior income tax officials in the process, and appointed new incumbents to head vital and sensitive agencies like the Enforcement Directorate (ED) and the Directorate of Anti-excise Evasion. At the end of the shake-up, every fourth officer above the rank of commissioner and collector had been shifted around. Said Singh: "The first phase of my budgetary exercise was over. Earlier, I had distributed carrots. Now it is the time for wielding the big stick."

In a sense, the changes were forced on him. A review of the functioning of the department of revenue had turned up the startling fact that tax recoveries had been 30 to 40 per cent short of the targets for the first quarter of the year. While the CBDT had recovered only Rs 500 crore against a target of Rs 800 crore, the CBEC had collected Rs 1,500 crore less than the target of Rs 5,000 crore. What annoyed Singh the most was not even these shortfalls, but that slackness on the part of the officials had resulted in a failure to realise tax arrears amounting to a staggering figure of Rs 2,000 crore.

During the budget-making exercises in February and March, Singh had warned his officials that if they failed to bring down the arrears and hasten the process of revenue recovery he would view it as administrative failure, and that heads would then roll. Meanwhile he started a process to screen the records of all the top officials in the revenue department, including those working with CBEC and the CBDT.

What exactly this showed up is not known. But the customs and excise officials seem to have taken the warning seriously, and launched "Operation Ketu" during which a specific hit list was prepared comprising serious cases of excise evasion. Soon after his warning the customs and excise authorities also began massive raids and conducted over a 100 searches, leading to the seizure of over Rs 81 crore of contraband goods in the first six months, as against Rs 100 crore during the previous year. The income tax authorities, however, did not take the finance minister's message seriously, and it was mainly the CBDT which attracted the finance minister's wrath.

In a surprise move that sent shock waves throughout the CBDT, Singh directed its Chairman, M. S. Narayana, to shunt out all senior income tax commissioners to non-field posts within 24 hours. Narayana had no option but to comply with his minister's sudden fiat and sent individual telex messages to eight senior officials of commissioner rank in New Delhi, Bombay, Calcutta, Haryana and Kerala asking them to hand over charge to the next in command and proceed as officers on special duty to the National Academy of Direct Taxes (NADT) in Nagpur, a training institution for new recruits.

At the end of the shake-up every fourth officer above the rank of commissioner and collector had been shifted around.

There was no mistaking the fact that Nagpur was meant to be a punishment posting, because the NADT had neither office accommodation nor work for so many senior officials. Surprisingly, none of them was served with a formal transfer order: nor were they due for transfer under the normal guidelines in the case of transfers.

This order was the second successive blow to the CBDT. Earlier in May and June, the Finance Ministry had filled five of the six board level vacancies by ignoring the time-honoured seniority principle. In the first of two orders on the subject, officers who were 14th and 21st on the seniority list were made members of the CBDT, superseding at least eight senior officials. In the second round, three officers who were 35th, 37th and 40th in seniority were appointed as board members, ignoring the claims of over 20 other senior commissioners. Their selection was justified on the plea that the Government had taken a conscious decision to appoint only those who had two years or more of service left. Said Singh: "I want to demolish this notion that CBDT membership is meant for rewarding officials who are on the verge of retirement. If an organisation dealing with policy issues is packed with people who are waiting for their day to end peacefully, one should not expect any innovative approach and dynamism from them."

Among others to be swept out by Singh's new broom was Revenue Secretary V.K. Dhar who had moved in only two months earlier. Before that, the Finance Ministry had moved Bhure Lal into the sensitive post of director, ED. Bhure Lal had been Singh's former secretary in Uttar Pradesh while Dhar's replacement as revenue secretary was Vinod Pandey, also from Uttar Pradesh.

Once Pandey was in place, Singh used him to implement his plans in the CBEC. On June 1, Pandey replaced CBEC Chairman R.C. Mishra with Jyotirmoy Dutta and transferred three board members—P.C. Sarkar, O.O Gangwani and B.B. Jhulka. This was the first time in the board's history that its members were being reverted to their parent departments without being elevated to higher positions. Then followed the large scale shifting of collectors of excise, and customs and revenue intelligence officials in which not a single major city was left out. In a series of orders passed in three days between June 28 and July 3, 1985, newly-appointed Chairman Dutta ordered the transfer of the collectors of customs and excise of Bombay, Delhi, Bangalore, Madras, Cochin and Ahmedabad, the director of the Directorate of Anti-excise Evasion, the appointment of a new member (anti-smuggling) in the CBEC and a new director-general of revenue intelligence.

Said Singh after his orders were carried out, "I am prepared for the second strike." And he was as good as his word. For he convened a meeting of all the senior officials dealing with revenue and told them that he expected them to generate at least 15 per cent more revenue than the targets fixed in the budget. Thus, the CBDT was given the target of raising an additional Rs 500 crore over and above the budget provision of Rs 4,700 crore. The CBEC was allotted Rs 3,000 crore over and above the Rs 20,000 crore provided in the budget. Said Dutta: "For a department which collects about Rs 65 crore a day, additional collection of Rs 6.5 crore is peanuts. It needs careful planning and choosing the right people for the job." Dutta claimed that in the recent selection of personnel he had done exactly that. For example, all the excise and customs officials posted in Bombay were transferred, to be followed by shifting the officials from Gujarat and Delhi.

The sweeping changes immediately became a target of criticism. The Indian Revenue Service Officers (Income Tax) Association (IRSOA) was quick to protest against the arbitrary transfers and expressed its doubts about the success of Singh's new approach. Said IRSOA in its memorandum to Singh: "On the face of it these transfer orders appear to be arbitrary as there was no indication of such an action." The IRSOA also said that such punitive action would discourage officials from taking risks. The association also pointed out that the ministry had not followed any specific guidelines in 'victimising' some people because they were not holding sensitive posts. Said a senior income tax official: "If the ministry feels that by replacing Tom with Dick and Dick with Harry it is going to close the deficit, it is highly mistaken."

But Singh is unfazed by the criticism, and argued that "the future of the economy cannot be linked with the personal promotional avenues of a few individuals. They are instruments for achieving certain goals and I have the right to choose my own instruments." Only a mid-term review of the budget in September will prove whether Singh is right or whether he is simply another bad workman blaming his tools. —PRABHU CHAWLA

PEICO

Name Game

FOR MANY weeks now, the famous logo and name have been strident in their claims to quality and reliability. "Philips For Television" is the advertisement message, accompanied by a series of slickly-produced newspaper rhymes exhorting the reader to realise "truly how remarkable is life ... when viewed in black and white". The high-profile campaign, estimated to have cost Rs 3 crore, is designed to position Philips "as the most experienced and largest manufacturer of TV sets".

But even as the hoardings went up and the black-and-white sets in three sizes hit shops all over the country, events were taking place in Delhi which could have serious implications for the electronics heavyweight that is Peico Electronics and Electricals Ltd (1984 sales Rs 225.1 crore). Savita Kohli, a journalist-turned-electronics entrepreneur, filed a complaint with a magistrate at the end of May, charging that she had been cheated into buying a 14-inch black-and-white TV set from a Delhi dealer which was supposed to have been made by Philips and was projected as its product. In fact, the set had been made by a lesser known firm. In doing so, said Kohli, "a false impression is being created in the minds of innocent purchasers who are tricked into buying material not manufactured by Philips at all."

The case is due to come up for hearing before Delhi Metropolitan Magistrate K.C. Lohia in mid-July. Meanwhile, a report filed by Rajkumar Singh of the Delhi police, acting on the basis of the complaint, threw up startling facts. Peico, it turned out, had no right to use the trade mark "Philips" and the logo with three wavy lines and four stars. The agreement between Peico and N.V. Philips Gloeilampenfabricken of Holland for the use of the name and logo had expired in 1983. The police officer's report went on to say that the company's marketing of TV sets not made by it and the use of a trade mark to which it has no prima facie right constitute offences under the notorious Section 420 of the penal code and Sections 78 and 79 of the Trade and Merchandise Marks Act (TMMA) 1958. Moreover, since the sets

FUTURA

The space-age pressure cooker

46% faster than microwave

Yes, unbelievable though it may sound, it is true! The Hawkins test kitchen undertook a series of comparative cooking trials. 19 recipes from soups to desserts, including fish, chicken, lamb, pork, beef, rice, pasta and vegetables were cooked in equal quantities in a microwave oven and in a Hawkins pressure cooker. In both cases, the food was tasted by an expert panel to ensure that it was cooked to the same proper extent. The total average cooking time for these 19 recipes in a microwave oven was 45 minutes per recipe and in a Hawkins pressure cooker, 24 minutes per recipe.

Don't believe it? Please write for a booklet showing the actual cooking time for each of the 19 recipes.

Modern Way to Tasty Food

A cookbook given free with every Futura contains 119 international and 18 Indian tested and tasty recipes. Be an international gourmet at home!

New Jewel-grey SATILON® Finish

Futura has a beautiful, jewel-grey Satilon finish which will not tarnish and is harder than steel. It is better than stainless steel because it is stick-resistant and has 13.7 times better thermal conductivity.

New Greater Convenience

Futura has a wide mouth and a shallow body for easy cooking and cleaning. It has a 6.3 mm heavy base which stays flat on your stove and is ideal for frying under pressure cooking.

Space-age Safety Features

Futura's new and unique safety and convenience feature is the cool, finger-tip control which provides instant, safe steam release after cooking. While cooking, it regulates pressure with greater efficiency than any other pressure cooker.

The Futura lid is pressure-locked from inside like a modern jetliner door. It cannot be forced open while there is pressure inside.

When needed, the safety valve operates automatically under the handle which deflects steam safely.

Good Value for Rs.500*

Futura is made by Hawkins, a name trusted by Indians for 25 years.

25 traditional Hawkins models are also available at lesser cost.

All are guaranteed by Hawkins. Go for the best according to your requirement.

For the address of dealers near you, write to Hawkins Dept. 323, P.O. Box 6481, Bombay 400 016.

were packed in cartons devoid of any name or address, the firms that manufactured the sets and the dealer who sold them are also offenders—the latter is liable for prosecution under the Standards of Weight and Measurements Act.

Further investigations revealed that Peico has no licence to manufacture television receivers, which were actually made by Orient Vision Ltd and Orientronics Ltd at their Hosur complex in Tamil Nadu and sold to Peico for Rs 1,335. Peico in turn sold it to the dealers at Rs 2,050 each.

The sets contained nothing made by Peico being built entirely from components bought by Orient Vision and Orientronics Ltd. Even the packaging material and the guarantee card were made by the Hosur firms owned by none other than the Amritraj family of tennis fame. Orient's own models are named after the three brothers: Orient Vijay, Orient Anand and Orient Ashok. In his statement to the police, G. Rangaswamy, factory manager, Orient Vision Ltd, said: "The models PHX-12 and PHX-14 are designed by me after modification of imported TV sets. The cabinets of the sets are supplied by Supreme Plastics of Bombay and the picture tube, antenna, tuners and other equipment come from different sources in the country. Peico Electronics has nothing to do as far as the quality control is concerned."

The Hosur firms are in addition to three other suppliers who furnish sets of 12, 14 and 20-inch sizes. One of them, Hi-Beam Electronics of Madras, imports components from Philips factories in Taiwan and Singapore and in return is helped with orders, prices and even delivery, shipment and transport schedules. Peico might even loan the firm equipment with which to build the sets. The advantage in farming out work in this manner is obvious: Peico estimates the market for black-and-white TV sets by 1986 at 1.4 million and is hoping to capture a hefty 8 per cent of the market, which works out to 1,12,000 sets.

The price is another factor for farming out work:

- Dugar Electronics of Calcutta makes a mono cassette recorder which it sells to Peico for Rs 377.65 and which Peico sells to the dealer for Rs 715.50. The customer ultimately pays Rs 935;
- Asha Pavro Electronics Ltd, Thane, Maharashtra, makes a two-band two-in-one and sells it for Rs 550 to Peico, in turn sells it to the dealer for Rs 1,035. The customer gets it for Rs 1,275;
- Prakash Electronics of Calcutta makes a battery eliminator which Peico buys for Rs 38 and sells to the dealer for Rs 57. The customer pays Rs 75;
- Precipneum of Goregaon, Bombay, makes a cheap single-band radio for Rs 71. Peico sells it for Rs 122.50 to the dealer and the customer pays Rs 160.

The margins are enormous and also raise the question of whether Peico is a predominantly manufacturing company or is turning into a trading firm intent on getting into as many segments of the fast-growing electronics market as possible. The Philips name is obviously the key factor in the sale. Naresh Kumar, partner in D.K. Radio in south Delhi where Kohli bought her set, admitted to investigating officers that "customers would not have purchased TV sets at the price of Rs 2,475 if they came to know that Philips had not manufactured it in the first place." Customer complaints provided further damning testimony. Air Force employee Keshan Sangwani, who bought a PHX-12 set from the same shop, says: "He (the dealer) told me it was a set made by Philips India. We purchased the set thinking it to be a TV set from Philips. If I had known earlier that this was not a TV set from Philips, I would not have paid such a high price of Rs 1,925."

"The official registered name is PEICO...We use the name Philips India as our trade name. That is quite common and we have the permission to do so."

CEES J. SEELEN
Chairman, PEICO

The case has come up just after the company inaugurated a brand-new electronics complex at Calcutta. At the inauguration ceremonies, Chairman Cees J. Seelen was asked what the actual name of the company was. His reply: "The official registered name is Peico. However, we use the name Philips India as our trade name. That is quite common and we have the permission to do so." But do they?

The Kohli case contains a statement by the examiner, Trade Marks Registry, Mahesh Gupta: "Philips India Ltd, Calcutta, were listed as the registered user of trade mark No. 81808 and 145525, that is the 'Philips' name and insignia up to the period of December 26, 1978, under the provisions of the TMMA. Thereafter, the application form No. TM 29 filed for extension of the period beyond December 26, 1978, was withdrawn by their agent's letter dated November 4, 1982, which says that the registered user agreement whereby Philips Ltd were entitled to use the trade mark Philips was terminated. There is no application pending under Section 49 of the TMMA with this office as per records available."

The licence agreement between the Dutch and the Indian company first came into effect in 1963 and was renewed until 1982 when the company applied for extension. This was later withdrawn. That is why the Company Secretary R.K. Arora says in what could be the most significant statement of the case: "At present we have no licence or consent letter from N.V. Philips to use the trade mark Philips in India." He also says that "after 1982 my company claims to be the owner of trade mark Philips and we have made an application in 1982 for registration of the trade mark in our name and it is pending with the trade marks registry in Bombay."

But even if the company has applied to the trade mark authorities for use of the name and the insignia, the authorities clearly believe that their present use on Peico products requires an explanation. While company executives are quiet on the implications of such allegedly unauthorised use, there is no doubt that Peico could be in deep trouble. Every one of its products, whether made in its factories or outside, carries the Philips label and their advertisements bank on the selling power of the "trusted household name for over 50 years." But the unpalatable fact is now getting known to the general public that neither the products nor the brand name of Philips may belong to the company.

25 YEARS OF ENGINEERING EXPERTISE IN INDIA'S CORE INDUSTRIES NOW COMES TO YOU IN ONE COMPLETE KIT

25 years ago a team of 16 workmen led by a man of dynamic enterprise set up a small Cast Iron Foundry in the industrial township of Bhilai. That was the beginning of Bhilai Engineering Corporation Limited (BEC), one of the earliest engineering ancillaries of the Bhilai Steel Plant.

Today, BEC is a technologically advanced Integrated Engineering Complex, providing vital inputs and services to a number of major industries in the country's core sector — Steel, Mines, Cement, Power, Heavy Industries and the Railways ... to name a few. BEC has also made a mark in the international market through exports of Steel Plant Equipment to Egypt, Bangladesh and the USSR.

A proven track record of engineering expertise in India's core industries

Baptised in the Steel Industry, BEC has pioneered the indigenous manufacture of items like Coke Oven Castings, Ingot Moulds, Sinter Cars, etc. (in the Private Sector). Outside the Public Sector, BEC has manufactured the largest quantities of Ingot Moulds, Heat Resistant Coke Oven Castings, Sinter Cars and Rolling Mill Roller Table Frames for the Integrated Steel Plants. BEC is one of the select few to manufacture such critical inputs for the Railways as Casnub Bogies, Couplers, Axle Boxes, Traction Motor Magnet Frames, etc.

Two and a half decades ago, BEC's equipment started replacing Russian equipment in the Steel Plants in India. Today, such equipment are being exported to the USSR under stringent quality control and time-bound programmes.

The Pursuit of Perfection

In its pursuit of perfection, BEC has built up an infrastructure for excellence:

- A dedicated team of 1300 top-class professionals — engineers, technicians, workmen and other vital personnel
- Modern facilities for Steel Castings (upto 15T piece weight); Alloy Steel Castings; Grey Iron and Alloy Iron Castings (upto 30T piece weight); fabrication of equipment and vessels (upto 50T piece weight); machining and assembly. All in the same premises
- Stringent quality control measures and testing facilities
- First-hand experience in major projects, working closely with technical experts from India and abroad
- Design and engineering expertise for metallurgical and mineral processing equipment, materials handling projects, environmental engineering and a host of other industries.

It is all this that has created an environment of excellence at BEC. For 25 years. Excellence that is now yours to avail in one complete kit.

PEPSICO

Losing Fizz

AMONG all the attempts by multinational giants to enter the Indian market in recent years, few have attracted as much front page attention world wide as the bid by Pepsico to introduce its cola and other soft drinks. Carefully packaged with associated offers to export fruit juices from India and to transfer special technologies in such areas as citrus farming, the Pepsi bid has almost become a test case of the Government of India's new attitude to overseas investment in the country.

Yet the Pepsi bid seems to have lost some of its fizz even before the first hopeful consumer can pop open a bottle. For after poring over the Pepsico proposal and following rounds of discussions with the American giant's representatives, government officials have come up with several objections and some questions. And unless the Cabinet decides to take a "political" decision, keeping in mind the possible fall-out that a thumbs down sign can have on other overseas companies seeking to invest in India, the Pepsi bid may soon be given short shrift.

The Department of Science and Technology has opposed the Pepsi proposal, apparently on the ground that the technologies offered are already available in India. Informed sources say that the Departments of Food and Technical Development as well as the Commerce Ministry have also turned down the Pepsico offer. But a spokesman of Agro Products Exports India (APEI), the Indian company that has proposed the tie-up with Pepsico, said last fortnight that as far as he knew most of these departments and ministries had not yet made up their minds, while one wing of the Government had declared that the technologies offered by Pepsico were required by the country.

Nevertheless, there is little doubt that Pepsi has run into various roadblocks. Government officials have pointed out that the APEI-Pepsico proposal runs counter to the country's import policy. The proposal envisages exporting fruit juices from India, in return for which Pepsico will be allowed to import cola concentrates worth one-third of the foreign exchange it earns on fruit exports. In Commerce Ministry jargon, this amounts to asking for an import replenishment entitlement of 33 per cent. But, as the officials point out, the import policy allows only a 10 per cent import replenishment against fruit juice exports; and further, only 10 per cent of this 10 per cent can be used to import soft drink flavourings. In other words, the policy says that only 1 per cent of the money earned on fruit juice exports can be used to import soft drink flavourings; Pepsico wants 33 per cent.

Officials have also questioned the basic arithmetic in the Pepsico proposal, and argued that the foreign exchange implications of the proposal are less favourable than indicated by APEI and Pepsico. Thus, the licence application for the proposal says that while fruit juice exports in the first year will amount to Rs 3.6 crore, the import of cola concentrates will amount to Rs 1.2 crore, giving an export-import ratio of 3:1. However, the fruit juices to be exported will be contained in imported special aseptic packages, costing another Rs 88 lakh, so that the total import bill actually goes up to Rs 2.08 crore. The actual export-import ratio, therefore, is less than 2:1. Some officials have even questioned a few of the assumptions made in the licence application, and argued that the foreign exchange balance could work out to be negative.

A third point has been made by those who have scrutinised the APEI-Pepsico proposal. The actual fruit content in the exports of fruit juice will be no more than Rs 18 lakh, constituting only 5 per cent of the final export value. And since this Rs 18 lakh will be earned from 1.12 million kg of fruit, the price per kilogramme of fruit works out to Rs 1.60. If Pepsico does manage to get fruit at that price, the fruit farmer will be getting very low returns. And the imported cost of the packaging material will be almost five times that of the fruit whose juice will be exported.

A reliable source indicated that a committee of officials had met and decided to reject the Pepsico proposal on these grounds. But it is likely that this will not be the last word on the subject, which is almost certain to go up to the Cabinet for a final decision. The APEI spokesman said that some of the officials' objections had been anticipated, that the proposal does call for a change in the import policy, and that even if officials come up with such objections there is always room for further discussions and suitable amendments to the original proposal.

Meanwhile, lobbying for and against the Pepsi package has intensified in Delhi. Some members of Parliament have stepped into the act on both sides, and Ramesh Chauhan of Parle Exports (which makes the Thums Up cola) has written to Rajiv Gandhi requesting a hearing before a final decision is taken.

Pepsico has already had its chance to try and convince Rajiv Gandhi. The company's president was present at four different functions attended by him during his visit to the US last month, and on at least one of these occasions managed to talk to the prime minister about his company's proposal to enter the Indian market. Rajiv Gandhi is described as having been a good listener through these meetings, taking notes but remaining noncommittal.

Meanwhile, the Government could find itself facing unwanted media publicity on this proposal if the final verdict is negative. The Pepsi bid has received considerable world-wide media attention, and has been viewed as a test of whether the Government of India has changed its stand since the days when Coca-Cola was thrown out of the country in 1978. This may not be a fair test, but there is little doubt that this is the way the foreign media will present the issue, especially when both China and the Soviet Union, apart from quite a few other socialist countries, have allowed Pepsi to enter their home markets. Conversely, however, a decision to allow Pepsi into India, overridding the objections of officials in some of the concerned ministries, could lead to media and parliamentary criticism at home. Either way, the Government is on a sticky wicket just now, and which way it will finally go is anybody's guess.

KERALA

Hotel Happy

IT WAS not so very long ago that even Trivandrum, the capital of Kerala could boast of only three good hotels and a total room capacity of a mere 150 rooms. But all that has changed. Today there are at least seven new hotels in the capital and room capacity has gone up to at least 650. That number is slated to go up even higher by the end of the year when four more hotels are opened. All this has happened in spite of soaring construction and real estate costs.

And the hotel boom is not restricted to just the state capital, or to just five-star hotels. Throughout the state there has been hectic hotel construction activity. On the national highway between Trivandrum and Kasargod on the northern most tip of the state there is, on the average, one hotel with a bar and restaurant every 10 kilometres. On the 75-km stretch between Cochin and Trichur there are at least 40 hotels with huge neon signs advertising their hospitality. In their enthusiasm the advertisements sometimes throw truth to the winds. In Ambalur, near Trichur the Elite Hotel, sited rather incongruously in the middle of a paddy field proudly proclaims that it has a revolving restaurant. On closer inspection it is apparent the restaurant does not revolve, but it is circular and perhaps after a long enough tipple, some of the guests might even persuade themselves that the scenery moves.

The irony is that many of new hotel rooms lie empty. Says Babu Thomas, a pioneer in the hotel trade in Kerala who sold his flagship Hotel Luciya Continental in Trivandrum last month: "Everybody who is somebody started building hotels in Trivandrum after it became an international airport. Today there are more international flights than ever but no tourists, and our occupancy is as low as 40 per cent." Thomas' Luciya Hotel in Trichur has an even more abysmal occupancy rate of 5 per cent and he says that he is trying hard to sell it off.

Other hotel owners in Trivandrum too are perturbed. Laments liquor baron Mohan Das, owner of the soon-to-be opened Hotel Surya: "Unless I have a tie up with a major hotel chain, it will be very difficult for me to break even."

Nonetheless there seems to be no let up in the boom. Sajen Varghese, the financier who bought Thomas' Luciya Continental is planning to upgrade it to a five-star hotel. In Calicut P.V. Chandran, a business tycoon of Malabar, is all set to launch the area's first five-star hotel next year and in Cochin some leading shrimp exporters are putting their money into luxury hotels with shopping complexes on the premises. Indians in the Gulf are also putting their money on hotels, and says a spokesman of the Kerala Financial Corporation: "There is a long queue outside our offices asking us to finance hotels from cities to remote villages."

The question is: why? Sajan Varghese feels the real estate value of his hotel is bound to go up. But five-star hotels aside, one likely reason for the plethora of more modest but nonetheless well fitted hotels, motels and inns is the excise policy of the Kerala Government. To get a bar licence in the state, a proposed hotel must have 10 rooms, of which two must be air-conditioned. So it would seem that all the hotels that line the national highway are just well outfitted bars. Says M.P. Manmathan, a Gandhian prohibitionist who successfully agitated a few months ago to close an arrack shop in Cochin: "Kerala is the only state in India which has made it necessary to have air-conditioned hotels to get bar licences. This has brought air-conditioned bars to villages and encouraged drinking."

Liquor barons in the state have certainly benefited. Several of them have at least three such bar and restaurant outfits each, many in the same area in which they used to have their retail liquor vends. The bar and restaurant business allows them to sell liquor in pegs. Though initially, according to a leading liquor dealer, the hotels were merely a modest ploy for getting around the excise laws, they have now turned into gold-mines compared to retail outlets, the success of which depended to a great extent on the whims of the Excise Department.

Legitimate hotel owners are also trying to do what hotels should be doing in the first place: draw in the tourists. Besides trying for tie-ups with foreign tour operators avidly, they are lobbying with the state Government to treat tourism as an industry. The Sri Lanka tourist trade which has been disrupted could be made to fall in Kerala's lap, they say. As and when the tourists do start flocking into the state, there will be no dearth of hoteliers offering them hospitality.

BIOTECHNOLOGY AND AGRICULTURE

Abstract of speech delivered by Dr. A.S. Ganguly, Chairman, Hindustan Lever Limited, at the Annual General Meeting held in Bombay on Tuesday, 18th June, 1985.

Among the economic priorities of the country is determining the choice of future technologies. Development is no longer leisurely and chronological. The first industrial revolution was fuelled by coal and steam power and the second by the chemical and electrical industries. Now change is being catalysed by the micro-processor on the one hand and genetic engineering on the other. These are the frontier areas of development which will usher in the next century.

The choice is not between the two, but on what priorities should be given to each one of them so that the country would be optimally served. The 'Green Revolution' was the beginning of agri-biotechnology application in its early days in India. The spread of satellite communications, weather forecasting and the extension of the television network over the last three or four years is an indication of the magnitude of manageable change.

India, compared to many nations of the South, is better equipped to undertake work in these areas which require a science and engineering base. While much is being written and discussed about electronics and telecommunications, the scope and potential of biotechnology in improving agricultural productivity needs to be brought into focus as well. Rapid advances have already taken place in Western Europe and the U.S.A. in this field. However, we know that exclusive dependence on imported technology has its own drawbacks since a certain level of national technology competence is necessary for more economical and acceptable global interaction.

As far as agricultural productivity improvements are concerned, the commendable advances which started in the sixties must continue. These include increase in fertilizer production and the use of new dwarf varieties of seeds, increased irrigation and cropping intensity, and specific inputs for dryland and marginal land farming. The quality of agricultural research in universities, and the transfer of information from laboratory to land have made phenomenal progress and must be further intensified. This has been matched by the response of farmers in adopting new methods and technologies. Several chemicals which have greatly enhanced field productivity are likely to improve in safety, versatility and effectiveness in the coming years. There are also areas of concern. The production of pulses and oilseeds has remained static; so has milk and fish output. Some of these represent critical deficiencies in the national dietary.

NEW FRONTIERS

For today's address, I have chosen a few areas of the application of science to agriculture. The topic is of interest to the Company and is also a national priority. These frontier areas of science are likely to supplement the stupendous national effort being made to increase agricultural output. It is necessary to reiterate the term 'supplement', because the bedrock of the agricultural economy has been well established by a series of technological and economic measures; we will have to continue to improve their effectiveness and extend them. As satellite communications are unlikely to replace surface mail in India, it would be unwise to expect that the application of 'new biology' will overtake traditional and well-tested methods in agriculture.

There are certain lessons to be learnt here from the West. With the discovery and production of Interferon over ten years ago and subsequent discoveries in genetic engineering and monoclonal technology, there grew a belief that traditional techniques of treating human disease would undergo a radical change. In spite of these explosive developments, progress has been less enchanting in business terms. There is, however, no doubt whatsoever that many of these dreams are likely to be realised before the turn of the century. In the meantime, traditional organic chemical drug therapy continues to make spectacular advances. In the final analysis it will be an interweaving of the traditional with genetic engineering techniques which will emerge in the battle against major diseases. Similarly in agriculture, it will be a combination of the well-tested with new scientific inputs which will usher in the next era of progress.

Hindustan Lever's history of the application of science and technology in its business is well-documented. Following the successful use of chemistry and technology to further traditional areas of business, new vistas are now being explored as part of our agri-business strategy. In this area, the achievements of Unilever research are very impressive indeed. It is this combination of a local science base and access to global developments which places the Company in a unique position for venturing into this area.

Biotechnology research has been in progress in a few laboratories in the country and more is planned, including a very ambitious national programme in collaboration with international agencies. But in order to be in the forefront of the fast developments that are taking place, greater coordination is necessary. I believe that industries dealing in agricultural products have a unique role to play both in the contribution they can make, and for the enormous opportunity they can provide in the longer term.

We recognise that an unassailable and strong agricultural economy is going to be a major factor in ushering in a more prosperous and confident future. Neither industry nor agriculture can thrive in isolation in this scheme of things. Nor will the developments envisaged follow the patterns long established in the well-endowed, sparsely populated and prosperous parts of the world. As in many other areas, development will have to match local conditions. In Hindustan Lever, we believe that there is now a growing interface between the agro-industry and agriculture which provides exciting opportunities for growth.

In the rest of this paper, I have dealt with broad issues associated with accelerating the application of frontier areas of science and technology research to agriculture and have cited specific areas of research and application which are important for successful agri-business development and growth in the Indian context.

BIOTECHNOLOGY AND AGRICULTURE

PRESENT POSITION

Improvements in agricultural productivity, particularly during this century have been science-led. Nowhere have the developments been as spectacular as in the U.S.A. The establishment and contribution of the Land Grant Colleges in that country was a consequence of the science pull in agricultural development. After World War II, these developments rapidly spread to Western Europe and certain other parts of the world. Advances took place in crop agriculture as well as in animal husbandry and pisciculture. This has created enormous surpluses of agriproducts, milk, fish, animal protein and edible fats.

In India, change began after Independence, first through import substitution, and then through the 'Green Revolution'. Education in agriculture, extension programmes, block development, increasing use of dwarf hybrids, fertilizers, pesticides and herbicides, and progressive coverage through irrigation all helped in these efforts. In spite of all this, agro-productivity is still predominantly monsoon-dependent.

As a result of intensive scientific research undertaken in the sixties, the industrial use of non-conventional oils such as ricebran, castor, kusum, mowrah, sal, neem and karanja increased and released the pressure on edible oils to some extent. However, per capita availability of indigenous edible oils has steadily decreased in spite of several steps taken, and imports have continued to increase. In 1984 a seminar was held in Delhi under the auspices of the Hindustan Lever Research Foundation (HLRF) at which eminent agricultural scientists from all over the country discussed the steps required to overcome this major problem.

An earlier HLRF seminar in 1982 discussed the problems of pulse production in India, which has been more or less stagnant for the last decade, thus reducing the per capita availability of protein to our largely vegetarian population.

The production of paddy, wheat and sugar has increased spectacularly through the application of scientific agriculture, and the progressive increase in the use of fertilizers, pesticides and herbicides. These have been supplemented by increasing investment in irrigation, storage and distribution facilities. But there are signs of levelling off and decrease in the value of incremental output compared to input costs.

Milk availability has increased modestly through cooperative dairies and government milk schemes in larger towns and cities. The introduction of crossbred cows has had limited success and the buffalo continues to be the main milch animal.

As for availability of animal protein, goat and lamb meat has been supplemented by increase in poultry farming. But per capita fish availability is steadily decreasing every year, which in turn is reflected in prices increasing much ahead of the general level of inflation.

Thus, in spite of many noteworthy achievements, there are several areas of concern as well. I believe that further strengthening of proven technologies and interweaving these with selective application of biotechnology will be the catalyst to improve agricultural productivity in India.

BIOTECHNOLOGY IN AGRICULTURE — A PRIORITY ACTIVITY

I mentioned earlier that there is a lot to be learnt from the experience of new biology in Western Europe and the U.S.A. During the last twenty years, there has been a veritable explosion of discoveries comparable only to what happened in particle physics and wave mechanics earlier in the century. The development of the atomic bomb was rapid, but peaceful applications of the new physics came much slower. Witness the controversy about nuclear power plants all over the world. Similarly, the commercial exploitation of the new biology has been slow. The noteworthy exception is the development of human insulin by the genetic manipulation of bacteria. As with all major dicoveries, we are passing through a phase of greater hopes than results. While it is necessary to take a cautious view of the speed with which the new biology will yield results, there can be no debate that our country has to plunge into it as an act of faith. We cannot afford to miss this unique opportunity to develop competence in a vital field which will soon be a major factor in geo-economics. It is also important to realise that as in any other scientific endeavour, global cooperation will be imperative. In order to participate in these developments of the twenty-first century, we have to prepare ourselves as partners rather than as supplicants.

As a result of the already high level of agricultural productivity and surpluses in the western world, biological and genetic research will continue to be predominantly devoted to human health in preference to agriculture. Furthermore, scientific applications in agriculture are not readily transferable unless there are suitable receiving agencies. Differences in agro-climatic conditions and plant types are also important factors.

With our limited resources, the choice of frontier areas of science for application, particularly to agriculture, must be selective. However, even within a limited scope, the costs and risks are going to be enormous and an exceptional order of skills required; so it is necessary to approach the issue as one having economic pre-eminence in the country's list of priorities. It would be my plea that all scientific and technological activities which lead to increased agricultural productivity should be considered to be of Core Economic Priority, not unlike many other areas where progress came only after such priority was given. In India, we have a well-established system of signalling economic priorities in the form of policy declarations and notifications. This has happened because major activities are state-funded, and especially as the scope of work and its costs would be beyond most university laboratories and many private industries.

Currently, the only activities meant exclusively for agricultural output and recognised as core industries of economic priority are inorganic fertilizers, pesticides and herbicides. They happen to be included in their own right as inorganic chemicals and heavy organic chemicals. The list now needs to be extended to include hitherto unconsidered activities related to agro-productivity which require modern techniques of biology, genetics and biotechnology.

AREAS OF RESEARCH

Biotechnology is sometimes erroneously thought to refer to genetic engineering. While genetic engineering is the specific technique of transferring gene expression through laboratory intervention, biotechnology involves converting discoveries in new biology into industrial and agricultural applications. These include a whole series of disciplines such as biofuels, nitrogen fixation, fermentation, plant hydrocarbons, antibiotics, vaccines, microbial insecticides and biomass production. In India the National Biotechnology Board has chosen genetic engineering, photosynthesis, tissue culture, enzyme engineering, alcohol fermentation and immunotechnology as areas of immediate interest.

It is, however, important to realise that although the potential is unlimited, the scientific and technological infrastructure required to exploit this vast field is equally formidable. Fermentation and enzyme technology or bio-catalysis have possibly made the greatest advances in industrial terms. This is manifest more in Japan than anywhere else. As a matter of fact, Japan regards biotechnology as the 'last major technological revolution of this century'.

In India we already have a reasonable base to produce fermentation products such as antibiotics and organic acids, and in spite of the resource constraints in the country, the scope is indeed unlimited. For example, the use of enzyme technology to produce a number of high value fine chemicals and developing energy conservation processes has hardly been looked into. There is one particular area in which HLL scientists have achieved considerable success. Oils and fats are the major raw materials of our business. While new avenues for enhancing output continue to be explored, we investigated the question of using genetically modified bacteria to produce edible quality oil and glycerine for industrial use. Economically, such a proposition can only be of interest to a perennially oil-short country like India.

Although the developments are still at an early stage, the results are encouraging. Scientists in our laboratory have manipulated genes of two edible varieties of yeast to produce a hybrid cell capable of not only producing and accumulating high amounts of fats of the order of 50% of the biomass, but also capable of utilising sugar at high rates and producing fat within 3-4 days. This unique feat has been accomplished by a novel technique of protoplast fusion and gene technology. Our chemical technologists have succeeded in growing this newly engineered species of yeast in pilot fermenters and successfully extracting good quality edible fat from the biomass. Although the investments in industrial scale-up are rather high, our scientists estimate that we could one day produce good quality edible fats from molasses at a cost of Rs.9000 — 10,000 per tonne.

We are also engaged in the production of a number of other chemicals via this route, although progress, by its very pioneering nature, is slow and the high costs of scale-up make it imperative to evolve cost-effective engineering design. The work of selecting and modifying micro-organisms to produce a whole series of highly valuable chemicals economically will become one of the primary foci of biotechnology research and development programmes in this country. This is also true of the development of enzyme technology where a beginning has yet to be made. Our initial forays into this field appear promising but will have to await successful industrial scale-up.

SOME PRACTICAL ASPECTS

To us in India, agriculture-related biotechnology is of exceptional importance. This encompasses key areas ranging from bio-insecticides, growth promoters/regulators and photosynthesis improvers to tissue culture, hybrid seeds production, genetic engineering and others including augmentation of edible fats and milk output and fish farming.

India owes its dramatic increase in cereals output to new hybrids such as the cross between Mexican dwarf and the Indian varieties. Indeed hybrid seeds today represent a big business opportunity in the country. The result of the union of two genotypes, hybrids are more efficient than their parents under a variety of agronomic conditions. Developed on systematic lines on a large scale, the spread effect and economic outcome will be quite significant. India is the first to produce hybrid cotton seeds by the novel 'hand pollination' method, evidence that the country has the capability to successfully forge ahead in this field.

Tissue culture is the tool in the propagation of true progenies of the parent plant with uniform growth and productivity characteristics for each species in a given agro-climatic environment through successive generations. The advantage of the technique in ensuring that commercial crops such as oil palm give the best possible yields is obvious. Unilever has achieved a breakthrough in the clonal propagation of oil palm. Begun 15 years ago, it is a successful commercial reality today. At Hindustan Lever's Laboratories, research is progressing with coconut palm. The tissue culture method, unlike the conventional methods of breeding, leads to obtaining increased genetic variability relatively rapidly. Fusion of cultured plant cells permits the development of unique hybrid plants. The technique could be valuable in achieving a breakthrough in the production of pulses and oilseeds.

Can the cells of cereal plants be genetically so altered that they use atmospheric nitrogen and thus become more productive? Can they be made to yield more with lower use of fertilizer? Can they thrive under conditions of moisture and salinity stress? Scientists are convinced that these will be achieved. Another area is the use of micro-organisms to aid the farmer harvest a better crop. Researchers know that symbiotic nitrogen-fixing bacteria boost yields of pulses and certain oilseed crops. Attempts must be now made to enhance their nitrogen-fixing ability severalfold through genetic manipulation and also make them crop -and soil-specific. This is a highly sophisticated scienfitic field. HLL's scientists have carried out research work and field tests with encouraging results for pulses and oilseeds.

95 per cent of the weight of plants come not from the soil but from atmospheric carbon dioxide and water. Apart from the genetics of plants, the major criterion determining the dry weight of the plant and the yield of the crops is photosynthesis. Scientists of Hindustan Lever have discovered a mixture of organic compounds which even in one ppm doses increases photosynthesis by 100 per cent or more. They believe that this route of enquiry is not only unravelling many new aspects of plant physiology but may yield other compounds which can be more readily transferred to farm practices. Besides photosynthesis improvers, growth promoters/regulators are assuming considerable importance in the U.S.A. and Europe and even in South East Asia. Most of these mimic the natural substances present in plants such as hormones and oxins. Norms for manufacturing and using these unique chemicals are being constantly revised to ensure their overall safety. We must adopt the latest technology in this sphere, the cost of which would be insignificant compared to the benefits to be derived.

Another new field is bio-insecticides which are of bacterial, fungal or viral origin. These, and pheromones — insect sex hormones, many of which are synthesized — if adopted, will be of considerable benefit to India's agriculture. Our researchers have succeeded in synthesizing certain pheromones and these are being tested.

CONCLUSION

processor and the computer revolution, they hold out enormous promise. Countries around the world are busily engaged in preparing their base to move into the forefront of what has been described as the 'technology of the next century'. After the initial euphoria there is a sense of cautious optimism. The conversion of laboratory discovery into commercial success has turned out to be more tortuous than anticipated. Nevertheless progress has been made.

While we gear ourselves to catch up in computers and telecommunications, biotechnology is a new challenge at the starting line. We have the science base to undertake this exciting journey and our need is also great. While I believe that increasing traditional inputs will further improve our already spectacular achievements in agricultural production, the application of biotechnology will be the catalyst for the next leap. Shorter term gains are to be had in areas where progress has been lagging, e.g. oilseeds, pulses and fish farming.

In a resource-short country like India, biotechnology has a major contribution to make. This has been demonstrated successfully in Japan. Secondly, while much of global biotechnology will be engaged in tackling problems of human health and disease in the more affluent nations, agricultural productivity will be the prime concern of the developing countries. Even here, once a research base is set up, the fallout could be significant in areas other than agriculture. For example, some useful work has already been done in India on the application of immunobiology in the detection of disease; future applications could be in treating diseases such as hepatitis, leprosy and malaria, and even for contraception.

The economic importance of research in new biology cannot be overstated; at the same time, there is the danger of understating the problems associated with it. The National Biotechnology Board has formulated certain schemes. Private industry has begun exploring opportunities. What is needed is a unified national approach interweaving the plans of the government and private industry into a tapestry of national goals. The tasks are too complex and the stakes too high to attempt any piecemeal approach. Only large goals and efforts are likely to produce results that bring real benefits as well as recognition in the international community in order to enable exchange of ideas and sharing of discoveries. This is how the great technology of the future is likely to evolve. We are ideally placed to ride the crest of this wave into the future. In recognition, this group of technologies must be accorded a place amongst the list of top economic priorities of the country.

Biological research and commercial application is a major strength of Unilever. In Hindustan Lever Limited, work on biochemical and agricultural research has been under way for several years. Some of the first discoveries are now entering the market place. Much more remains to be done. It is the combined strength of Unilever's global reach and HLL's scientific record which gives us the confidence to commit ourselves to the application of biotechnology to agriculture as a part of the Company's long term strategy.

Prices have once again stabilised as money supply conditions remain extremely tight. Despite the continued boom in share prices and the optimism prevalent in industrial circles, manufacturing output shows signs of stagnation. An improved performance by hydel power stations may ease the power situation, though the sharp fall in nuclear power generation is cause for concern.

All data are seasonally adjusted. Current trends are computed on the basis of the last six month's data to which a regression is fitted.

Wholesale Price Index

1970-71 = 100

Current Trend 6.8% p.a

Prices stabilised again after an ominous increase last month. Last fortnight saw a rise of only 0.1 per cent, well below the current trend.

Industrial Production Index

1970 = 100

Current Trend 8.0% p.a.

Industrial production picked up last month by 1.1 per cent. Machinery and mining industries did better than the rest.

Manufacturing Output Index

1970 = 100

Current Trend 6.6% p.a.

Manufacturing industries' growth recorded a drop of 0.2 per cent mainly caused by a fall in chemical and food manufacturing.

Money Supply-M3

Rs Crores

Current Trend 13.5% p.a.

Money supply was under tight control with a sharp drop in the growth rate last fortnight, mainly on account of a fall in exchange reserves.

Commercial Bank Credit

Rs Crores

Current Trend 16.4% p.a.

Commercial credit conditions tightened sharply last fortnight with an increase of only 0.3 per cent—well below the current trend.

Share Price Index

1970-71 = 100

Current Trend 64.0% p.a.

The unprecedented boom continued till mid-June—share prices rose by 6.9 per cent—paper, silk and transport shares performed best.

Power Generation

Million kwh

Current Trend 2.9% p.a.

After six months of stagnation, electricity generation increased by 2.2 per cent last month. Hydel generation rose but nuclear power dropped.

Closing Gold Prices

Rs. per 10 gms

Current Trend 22.0% p.a.

Gold prices showed an upward trend last fortnight—rising by 1.8 per cent—after several weeks of bearish trading.

Most houses are built around a common way of life. A few are a way of life themselves.

The French Villa and the Continental Villa at Ansals Palam Vihar.

A flavour of France

The French Villa at Ansals Palam Vihar. It has a French touch to everything. Sloping red roofs, beautiful bay windows, quaint balconies and lofts. Elegant staircases with carved balustrades and verandahs with old-style columns. And to complete the picture, a lovely landscaped garden out front. Tinted glass entrance doors lead you into the house from the wide verandah. A decorative wooden ceiling adds warmth to the house. And if you wish, you can have a wooden parquet floor to lend it a truly French flavour.

Plot Size: 800 sq.yds.
Built-up area: 2900 sq.ft.
PRICE: Rs.9,85,000/-

A life of luxury

In Ansals Palam Vihar, you'll be living in the lap of luxury. This entire colony has been specially designed to meet the needs of 50,000 cosmopolitan people. Every facility like schools, hospitals, postal services, police stations has been provided. And sensitive attention has been given to environment and entertainment. Which is why Ansals Palam Vihar is full of lush parks and a number of clubs, pools, cinemas and playgrounds. In fact an entire wood has been created and a special jogging track laid out. And an exclusive shopping-cum-office complex Palam Vyapaar Kendra — provides all necessary amenities.

A touch of European elegance

An exquisite combination of splendour and style creates the elegance of the Continental Villa. Exquisite architraves over doors and windows, balconies with sculptured railings and spacious sit-out verandahs overlook a lovely landscaped garden. Continental style wooden doors with ornamental fittings give it a European touch of class.

Plot Size: 520 sq.yds.
Built-up area: 2595 sq.ft.
PRICE: Rs.7,90,000/-

THE MARKETS

Bullish Trend

AT LONG last, and with some hesitation, the laws of gravity have reasserted themselves on the stock-market. After several months of continuous rise, share prices finally dipped with the onset of July and helped put an end to the growing disbelief about the behaviour of the market.

The tax man played his role too, with share-brokers becoming the target of raids for the first time in recent memory. But, oddly enough, prices ruled steady within a couple of days of the raids. For a while, this seemed like continued market bravado, but it soon became clear that the raids had not really been meant to unearth the use of black money in share transactions. Instead, the taxmen nabbed only those brokers who were engaged in business on behalf of investment companies.

The most notable feature of the fortnight, therefore, was not the raids but the behaviour of the share prices. There has been no sharp fall in price levels, as some had feared, but it seems entirely likely that the market adjustment that started in early July is not yet complete and that a further drop in share values will take place in the immediate future.

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

The other element in the situation predicating a drop in share prices is the stand taken by the controller of Capital Issues, the executive director of the Bombay Stock Exchange and the members of the exchange governing board that there must be a reduction in the amount of speculative business conducted on the exchange. Since much of the business continues to be in the form of purchases and the carryover charges on the settlement are continuing to increase, the new fiat from the authorities could mean a liquidation of purchases.

Against this, however, investors must reckon with the fact that the underlying sentiment of the market remains bullish, and that there is no end to the basic optimism that led to the equity spurt in the first place. And once the technical correction takes place on the market, this bullish sentiment could well assert itself once again. In ACC, for instance, the company may announce a bonus share issue that was held back at the last minute last year. Great Eastern may also witness a spurt with the prospect of the company returning to the dividend list, and Orkay could get a boost because the company is readying to enter the capital market once again.

The key question right now is how long and how sharp will be the reaction on the market before the bullish trend reasserts itself. Since D.R. Mehta is due to relinquish office as controller of Capital Issues in mid-July, and since he is known to be the man most intent so far on bringing some stability to the market, his exit could well provide the signal for a fresh spurt on the stock exchange.

An excellent investment opportunity from an enterprise that takes pride in the pursuit of excellence

The Company

Escorts Limited is the seventh largest engineering company in the country. It is a market leader in the manufacture of agricultural tractors, motorcycles, shock absorbers, pistons, self propelled mobile cranes, tractor mounted elevators, loaders; air-brake systems, centre buffer couplers for railways; industrial and domestic heating elements and power generation equipment; electro-medical and industrial X-Ray equipment. The Company's plants are located in different States in the country employing a total work force of about 16,000 persons.

Exciting Future

Escorts is poised for an even brighter future.

Its Rs. 32 crore project for the manufacture of 1,50,000 — 100/150 cc. YAMAHA motorcycles in technical collaboration with Yamaha Motor Company of Japan is nearing completion at Surajpur, (U.P.) and the first motorcycle is expected to roll out by October, 1985.

Expansion programmes for doubling the existing capacities of piston assemblies at Patiala and shock absorbers are under implementation. Escorts also proposes to increase production of its premium products which have the highest industrial market share.

Escorts has recently obtained government approvals for manufacture of gas pressure shock absorbers in collaboration with the world renowned BILSTEIN AG, West Germany and for hydraulic mobile cranes with lifting capacities upto 40 tonnes with FAUN of West Germany. Letters of Intent for manufacture of B/W Picture Tubes, telecommunication equipment are being implemented in technical collaboration with leading Japanese and German companies.

With the commissioning of India's first and the world's most modern floating Dry Dock at a cost of over Rs. 22 crores, Escorts has made an entry into the ship repairing industry and proposes to manufacture equipment for off-shore drilling also.

Excellent Track Record

Escorts has an excellent track record of consistent growth.

Its turnover has increased from Rs. 62 crores in 1974 to Rs. 328 crores in 1984 — an average growth rate of 5.3% per annum. Reserves have increased from Rs. 4.4 crores in 1974 to Rs. 42.9 crores in 1984, despite Bonus Issues in the proportion of 1:2, 3:5 and 3:5 in 1974, 1977 and 1979 respectively. Gross Assets have increased from Rs. 14.45 crores in 1974 to Rs. 125.28 crores in 1984. The Book Value of the Company's Rs. 10/- paid up Equity Share is Rs. 42.03.

Rich Rewards to Shareholders

Since 1964, the Company has made seven bonus issues. The present Equity Capital of Rs. 13.38 crores includes Bonus Issues of Rs. 11.41 crores. On 100 Equity Shares held in 1961, members have so far received 2029 Bonus Equity Shares and 251 Right Equity Shares besides consistently handsome dividends.

Pakistani, stand muzzle-to-muzzle in the upper reaches of Karakoram along Siachen, which at 73 kilometres is the second biggest glacier outside the polar region.

The elements are daunting, but cold is by no means their only enemy. There are incidents of firing almost every week, spilling blood on both sides. "What surprises us", says an Indian army officer in Srinagar, "is that the happenings in Siachen just do not seem to be affected by anything that happens at the diplomatic level." There can hardly be a better illustration than the bloody incidents of firing that broke out last fortnight just when the Indo-Pak joint commission was winding its second meeting in Delhi.

The incidents came after a period of relative calm. Near Gyangla in the region radiating southwards from Bilafondla (see map), a small detachment of Indian troops suddenly woke up to find itself under a rain of mortar shells. In a short spell of firing nine mortar shells landed perilously close to the post damaging some of the Indian bunkers and snow-shelters though no one was hit in the attack. The Indian troops retaliated with medium machine-gun and rocket fire. A Pakistani bivouac was momentarily caught in the open and later the Pakistanis were seen collecting their wounded. The incident triggered off a chain reaction with a few other posts scattered along the glacier exchanging sporadic bursts of fire but a conflagration was avoided.

Indian defence and diplomatic sources say the sudden firing was not so much a probing mission as an effort to keep tension alive in the region. Said an official: "After Benazir Bhutto's statement in London last week that Zia has surrendered the Siachen glacier to India the Pakistan Government is under pressure to prove to its people that it has not given up its claim on the area. We see the new incidents in that perspective."

The current spate of violence, in any case, is part of a persistent Pakistani campaign to retrieve lost ground. Over the last six months Pakistani troops have persistently launched probing missions aiming to outflank the Indian positions. The campaign peaked in May when a company of Pakistani troops tried to cut off the supply lines of an Indian post near Bilafondla. But an Indian patrol spotted the movement in time and the Pakistani detachment was ambushed. The Northern Command at Udhampur now presents a few Pakistani tents and equipment captured soon after the clash, with pride.

Indian officers involved in the operation say it was this failure that led the Pakistani commanders to embark on aerial photography of the glacial region with the intention of mapping out the Indian positions. The formation of six Pakistani aircraft, two Mirage Vs (reconnaissance version) and four MiG-19s as escort was spotted first by an Indian shorthaul transport aircraft on a routine drop-sortie in the region. The Pakistani aircraft hovered over the area for five to six minutes which, according to Indian spokesmen, was too short a period for the Indian Air Force (IAF) to scramble interceptors from Srinagar or Avantipur, the nearest bases.

The area radiating eastwards from Siachen is among the most inhospitable in the world. That is perhaps why both India and Pakistan had so far shown no inclination to demarcate the borderline here.

In fact, in its July 6 issue the reputed Jane's Defence Weekly reported that India had shot down a Pakistani helicopter over Siachen. Sources in Delhi, however, say that troops in Siachen have often fired at low-flying helicopters and reported hitting at least two. But none has been seen crashing and no wreckage has ever been found.

In terms of the toll it is taking on human and financial resources, the conflagration in Siachen is prohibitively expensive for both sides. Says an Indian commander: "Ultimately, you feel sorry for the poor fellows from both sides fighting at those heights. Even the healthiest soldier is prone to developing all kinds of diseases, from pyorrhoea to piles and hypertension to rheumatism in those conditions. The military hospital in Leh has had a busy time treating casualties from high altitude exposure."

There have also been serious problems of logistics and supplies and the army and the air force, which maintains the Siachen garrisons, have had to do the ultimate in ingenuity and improvisation. The army, for example, found itself exposed to howitzer fire from the Pakistani positions and decided that it had to have heavy guns of its own. While dismantled howitzers were airlifted to the region with great difficulty, the gunners then said they needed cranes to put the guns together. Even these were ultimately improvised from the meagre technical infrastructure available on the spot and the fire-power balance was restored.

Similarly the IAF is rewriting record books. Most of its helicopters, the Cheetah (Allouette III) and Mi-8 have a service ceiling of just about 18,000 feet. But supply and casualty evacuation missions in the region imply having to constantly fly above terrain higher than 18,000 feet. As a consequence helicopter pilots are forced to fly merely 5-10 metres above the jagged terrain. One helicopter pilot, Wing Commander Tajinder Pal Chhatwal, created a record of sorts by flying 42 such sorties in a day to supply advance pickets and earned himself a Shaurya Chakra. The IAF-men make particular mention of a bleak day in May 1984 while the operation was just being launched, and two Cheetah helicopters got into trouble almost simultaneously. One force landed at 18,000 feet and the other crash-landed 700 feet below. After three months of preparation Corporal Charivukalayil Govindan Soman, an air-frame fitter trekked to the area, dismantled the helicopters and made their retrieval possible. His reward too is a Shaurya Chakra.

Both India and Pakistan justify this rather exaggerated build-up in such desolate country in terms of their own strategic perceptions which put a heavy premium on the control of Siachen salient. The Indian view is explained by a general who says: "The strategic Tibet-Sinkiang road passes through territory captured by China east of Siachen. Northwards we have the new road from Pakistan going through the Khunjerab Pass. These form a noose round India's jugular. If they took Siachen, they would be holding a dagger to our backs in the Nubra Valley."

But what surprises military observers is the apparent suddenness of this strategic realisation. The area radiating eastwards from Siachen is among the most inhospitable anywhere in the world. That is perhaps the reason why both India and Pakistan had so far shown no inclination to demarcate the borderline here. The 1949 Karachi agreement as well as the Simla agreement agreed on a borderline terminating at point NJ 9842 on the map. The rest was left undecided, a kind of forbidden land no man was ever likely to claim. But things changed with changing technologies and geopolitics and after the 1971 war, Pakistan began showing an increasing interest in the area. It had better contiguity with the area which it flanks from west and the north and to the east

UNITED INDUSTRIAL BANK LIMITED

STATEMENT BY
SHRI J. N. BISWAS
CHAIRMAN
UNITED INDUSTRIAL BANK LTD.
AT THE FORTY-FIFTH ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING OF THE BANK
HELD IN CALCUTTA
ON JUNE 21, 1985.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me great pleasure in welcoming you to the Forty-Fifth Annual General Meeting of your Company.

Before dealing with the formal business today, I feel it is only appropriate for me to refer to the tragedy faced by the nation in the assassination of our late Prime Minister, Smt. Indira Gandhi, in October last year. Smt. Gandhi's outstanding contribution to the cause of socio-economic development of India as well as other third world countries will always be remembered with gratitude. I am sure you will all join me in paying our humble tribute to her memory.

Economic Environment

It is heartening to note that the Indian economy has attained a reasonably strong position at a time when we have just launched the Seventh Five Year Plan. According to the latest available estimates, in 1984-85. Gross National Product at constant prices has gone up by 4% with agricultural production registering a modest increase over the peak of 1983-84 and industrial production rising by 7%. Infrastructural services have shown marked improvement and price rise has been moderate.

The outlook for 1985-86 is, on the whole, good. While production growth and improvement in infrastructure are distinctly favourable indications, the possible areas of concern relate to prices and balance of payments. In West Bengal, the economic trend is quite encouraging, particularly with a new wave of industrial ventures being initiated in the joint sector. Also, there has been a commendable progress in the revival of sick industrial units in the State. Thus, with a favourable industrial climate in West Bengal where a major part of our banking operations take place, United Industrial Bank is poised to contribute towards rapid growth of the region.

Trends in Business

During 1984, despite a marginal increase in number of offices, your Bank's year-end deposits increased from Rs. 140.67 crores in 1983 to Rs. 180.06 crores in 1984, registering a 28.0% growth as against 14.0% growth in deposits of all scheduled commercial banks.

Similarly, your Bank's advances recorded a 34.0% growth in 1984 which compared favourably with a 16.1% growth in advances of all scheduled commercial banks.

It should also be mentioned that in 1984 advances to priority sector activities such as agriculturists, small-scale industrialists, transport operators and retail traders aggregated Rs. 29.33 crores and the beneficiaries in such priority sector loan accounts have demonstrated an encouraging performance in their respective areas of business.

Better Service and Greater Efficiency

In its continuous and consistent pursuit of offering better services to the existing as well as new customers your Bank has initiated the following measures:

1) Special emphasis on reaching out to people by opening new branches; so far in 1985 the Bank has received licences for opening 18 new branches.
2) To introduce staggered banking hours to cater to the requirements of customers in primarily residential areas.
3) To introduce teller system to speed up payments to depositors.
4) Introduction of exclusive banking counters for children, the future citizens, to inculcate banking habits in them. Introduce exclusive banking counters for ladies to mobilise household savings.
5) To set up international division to facilitate foreign exchange operations.
6) To offer special assistance to industrial units and priority sector borrowers in terms of counselling and extension services.

In order to offer better and efficient services, the Central Office of the Bank has been set up in 1984.

Growth and Diversification

As an organisation, your Bank has always responded successfully to the newly emerging challenges of business. With a keen sense of dynamism, the Bank envisages new areas of growth and is planning to undertake a major diversification in the form of merchant banking.

Recognising the growing needs and the complexity of raising resources for industrial projects, your Bank has decided to set up a merchant banking division to offer specialised services to our customers, existing and prospective, which include project counselling, loan syndication, management of public issues, etc.

It is expected that the division would start functioning shortly.

Banking Policies

Banking in India has made rapid strides since the nationalisation of major scheduled commercial banks in 1969. Today, Indian banking system is recognised universally for the volume and complexity of its business operations and for the resilience it has demonstrated while combining traditional business with emerging social priorities.

The Reserve Bank of India, too, has its own pride of place among the Central Banks of the world for successfully monitoring and guiding the evolution of Indian banking system. In 1984, the Reserve Bank of India credit policy was guided by the objective of deploying bank resources to support public sector investment and to meet increased demand for credit from the commercial sector following expectations for higher food procurement and industrial growth. At the same time due priority was accorded to ensure control on inflationary pressures through bringing about a deceleration in the growth of money stock and regulating liquidity of the banking system. Raising of Statutory Liquidity Ratio (SLR) has been the most important policy measures in this regard.

Thrust of the new Government headed by a young and energetic Prime Minister, Shri Rajiv Gandhi, is towards relaxation of unnecessary controls and doing away with red tapism. It is hoped that in tune with this new trend of thinking the Reserve Bank of India will give more freedom and greater operational flexibility to the Banks so that they can substantially contribute towards the achievement of the national objectives.

Some suggestions

I feel, there should be closer coordination and greater understanding among the institutions involved in financing projects. In this regard, I put forward the following suggestions:

1) Insurance Companies must expedite settlement of claims because delay in such settlements leads to difficulties for the banks.
2) Deposit insurance and Credit Guarantee Corporation of India must review their policies and try to reverse the trend of reducing the extent of coverage of loans. DICGCI should expedite settlement of claims.
3) In view of the multiplicity of borrowal accounts, particularly in rural branches with limited manpower, the limitation period under the Limitation Act be extended in case of Bank's dues.
4) Industrial Development Bank of India and National Bank For Agriculture and Rural Development should raise the limits for automatic refinancing fixed long time back as has been generally done in other cases.

Acknowledgements

I would like to thank all the employees but for whose sincere efforts there could not have been harmony in industrial relations and a sustained move to improve productivity.

I would also like to place on record my appreciation to my colleagues on the Board for their support, encouragement and guidance and our thanks to our innumerable customers and well wishers both home and abroad for their patronage and to the Government of India, Reserve Bank of India and Government of West Bengal and other State Governments for consideration shown to the Bank. Before I conclude, I must thank all the shareholders for their faith and confidence to the Institution.

Thank you all.

Note: This does not purport to be the proceedings of the Annual General Meeting.

lies the territory in occupied Kashmir which Pakistan has ceded to China.

The Pakistani plan was simple and effective, to establish control over the region by sponsoring foreign expeditions to the virgin peaks here and thus having the territory listed as Pakistani in reputed international journals. To begin with it succeeded and Pakistan went merrily sending mountaineering expeditions across the glacier without as much as drawing a diplomatic protest note in return. For over a decade, most international mountaineering journals had been listing these as expeditions carried out in Pakistan. On the face of it, it seems, the Indian army operations directorate reacted with alarm after seeing maps of the region in reputed foreign mountaineering journals showing Siachen in Pakistan Occupied Kashmir.

The Siachen glacier: protracted battle

THE INITIAL Indian response was sporadic patrolling of the area, much in the fashion of the anaemic effort that had met the Chinese claims over Aksai Chin in the '60s. In the late '70s the Indian army also launched a few expeditions into the area. This peaked in 1981 with Colonel N. Kumar, the renowned climber, leading a large team from the Sonmarg-based High Altitude Warfare School across Siachen. The group scaled, among other peaks, the formidable Sia Kangri and Saltoro Kangri, both overlooking Siachen from perches higher than 7,000 metres.

Intelligence sensors were soon abuzz with the reports that this had caused consternation in the Pakistani General Headquarters. They were planning to raise a special high altitude warfare force to take over the area militarily. This led to discussions at the prime minister's level and Mrs Gandhi gave the army the authority, some time in late 1982, to go shopping. A frenzied race followed with the Indian and Pakistani military delegations often finding themselves in the same cities of Europe and scouting for similar equipment at the same firms. But India pipped Pakistan at the post and in an operation masterminded by the then XVI Corps Commander Lieutenant-General P.N. Hoon in May last year elements of the 4th battalion of Kumaon Regiment hoisted the tricolour in the region in spite of heavy losses due to avalanches. Indian officials now admit to losing at least 40 lives to various "operation-related" causes around Siachen. Besides many more have been wounded, frost-bitten or taken ill due to exposure. Lt-General M.L. Chhibbar, GOC-in-C Northern Command estimates the Pakistani casualties to be close to a hundred.

While attention has lately been confined to the glacial region there has been trouble elsewhere too. Last fortnight there were frequent reports of mortar and small arms fire in the central and north-western sectors in Kashmir. The incidents were concentrated in the area between Rajauri and Poonch and included intermittent firing from the Pakistani post of New Nali over Indian border outposts and firing from the Pakistani post of Lanjot near Poonch river over the Indian positions held by the 6th battalion of Sikh Light Infantry.

BSF officials say the Pakistani intentions seem to be mainly to provide a cover to their civilians who often infiltrate across the border in search of drinking water. "We try to prevent this by firing in the air", said an official, adding, "the standard Pakistani response is a heavy fusilade, with a generous mix of tracers meant to set the dry grass on fire so that our troops have to withdraw for the time being." But all security planners in South Block do not dismiss these incidents as of no consequence.

They point out that these incidents are taking place along the section of the Line of Control where the Pakistani troop concentration is most daunting. Between their I Corps at Mangla and X Corps at Rawalpindi the Pakistanis have at least five divisions of troops facing the Pir Panjal ranges. These are buttressed by at least six brigades of so-called "Azad Kashmir" troops. Intelligence sources also report the raising of at least three new battalions of "Azad Kashmir" regiment at a place called Mansar along with the new recruitment in Mujahid battalions. "Immediately, we have no evidence to say that the new raisings will necessarily lead to a misadventure, but it hardly augurs well for us," says an official.

Defence experts say that in case a conflict takes place with Pakistan in future, both sides will concentrate on Kashmir since permanent territorial gains are possible only across the Line of Control. From the Pakistani point of view India has already "gained" nearly 3,000 square kilometres of territory in the Siachen region.

In South Block meanwhile, a firm decision has been taken to hold the glacial region even if it leads to repercussions elsewhere on the borders. The defence forces have been given a virtual carte blanche on purchasing the latest equipment in high altitude warfare from wherever it is available in international markets. One indication of this resolve last month was a government notification throwing open 15 of the better known peaks around Siachen to international expeditions on the condition that each group will be led by an Indian. And an Indo-British expedition is, accordingly, likely to be in the region this fall. This is bound to upset Pakistan. It is reasonably logical to presume that their next move would be to keep the tension alive by firing here and there.

But the Indian perception is that this kind of tension is a worthwhile price to pay for cementing India's claim over the territory. Said an officer: "We take Siachen as a test case. We want to assert that the Indian strategic doctrine of the '80s goes way beyond the docility of the '50s and '60s, that it is no longer possible to gnaw at our far-flung territories and then get away with no more than filibustry at the United Nations." It goes without saying that his counterparts across the line of control understand the message perfectly well. Their response too would be far from docile. And that will only ensure more blood-letting in the desolate Karakoram wastes. —SHEKHAR GUPTA

FAMILY PLANNING

Reviving the Battle

THE AGE of the red triangle is born again. Those who recall witnessing the 1970s blitz of publicity followed by the massive politicisation of the family planning programme that led, eventually, to the Congress defeat in the 1977 elections will also remember subsequent governments giving short shrift to the programme. Almost overnight family planning disappeared from the public eye, sterilisations became a dirty word and the ministry of family planning was even renamed family welfare. Some of those revisionist policies are at present undergoing another set of revisions in reverse gear, so that family planning has emerged, in the new Rajiv Gandhi age, as Priority Number One for the Government. Repeatedly on his American tour, the prime minister emphasised the magnitude of India's population problem; on his return he was closeted for several hours last fortnight not only with officials of the Health Ministry but a variety of experts, among them demographers, social scientists and members of voluntary agencies to understand the complex issues at stake. And at his press conference last week he admitted the present deficiencies in the programme, promising that major policy changes will be presented in the "next week or two".

Consequently, a flurry of activity has lately become evident in the Ministry of Health & Family Welfare, with officials falling over one another to produce new charts, refute statistics and evaluate new strategies to give the programme a much-needed shot in the arm. Among the new proposals is a USAID-mooted scheme to delink the social marketing of family planning aids from private and public sector agencies by the setting up of an autonomous non-profit society known as the Contraceptive Marketing Organisation (CMO). The United States Agency for International Development (USAID), in fact, in 1983 commissioned Price Waterhouse, well-known company of management consultants, to prepare a study of the feasibility of such an organisation; their report, made available to INDIA TODAY, strongly recommended the establishing of an organisation which would combine the "flexibility and speed of decision of the private sector and some of the authority of government". The CMO, as a result, came officially into existence last September and the Health Ministry has recently advertised for a highly-paid chief executive to head it. Says Serla Grewal, secretary in the Health Ministry: "Our effort in the social marketing of contraceptives has had limited success. We find that spacing techniques for birth control, that is, the use of condoms, IUD's, the pill and so on, are in future likely to be more important than terminal methods. And a significantly expanded distribution of contraceptives can only be achieved as part of an overall marketing programme. We want to try out, with greater freedom, new techniques in social marketing and use of the information media in an unfettered manner."

Cartoon by NINAN

As soon as the CMO gets going, its first job will be to take over the marketing and distribution of conventional contraceptives (condoms, pills, and so on) which till last year were partly handled by private sector corporations with an established marketing network. Some 210 million condoms were distributed free in 1984-85, and nearly half through commercial agencies. Says R.P. Kapoor, additional secretary in the Health Ministry and commissioner, family welfare: "The idea is that the CMO will initially take on social marketing of contraceptives and later move into promoting other non-clinical methods of birth control."

The Price Waterhouse report emphasises the autonomous nature of the organisation, commercial in outlook, compact in size and structure and capable of serving as a lead institution. Broadly, its functions would entail:

- direct procurement of contraceptives from manufacturer and maintenance of quality control;
- free or subsidised distribution planning and implementation, starting with condoms;
- information, education and communication activities to complement particularly in the area of training the efforts of existing bodies;
- introducing advertising and promotion campaigns through professional agencies and monitoring the contraceptive marketing programme regularly through market research and information systems.

The CMO will be attended by a governing board, made up of secretaries to the Government, its own directors and representatives of manufacturers and others as well as two advisory councils: the first will be made up of specialists from interested groups involved in the organisation and the second, more important, by a marketing advisory panel consisting of eminent marketing professionals. The report recommends a decentralised organisation functioning through five regional offices with a total staff strength of about hundred people drawn from the field of consumer marketing, the pharmaceutical industry and professional management, and puts the organisation costs at about Rs 15 crore.

The idea behind the CMO, to sell family planning aids as widely and expediently as soap or any other consumer product, is part of the Health Ministry's search for new strategies. The second proposal is to implement cash incentives for couples undergoing sterilisation after two children: stipends of Rs 50 a month or a bond of Rs 1 lakh, encashable after 20 years, if the two children happen to be girls.

While Grewal and other ministry officials testify to a keen interest on the part of the new Government to closely examine the present family planning programme and, wherever possible, reinforce it. This is because, in the words of the prime minister himself, the programme's "dividends have not been commensurate with the investment."

The statistics for the last few years paint a depressing picture and hardly indicate the transformation of the programme into the people's movement that policy planners speak of. According to census figures, India's annual population growth rate has remained stationary at 2.2 per cent for the decade 1971-81; the decline in the birth rate has not kept pace with the decline in the death rate, staying at 3.7 per cent for the same period; and the Sixth Plan target of covering 36 per cent of eligible couples with contraception has fallen short by 4 per cent. The number of eligible couples using contraception in India went up from about 22 per cent in 1980 to 32 per cent in 1985, whereas in other developing countries, the figures for a similar five-year span show galloping increases: from 13 per cent to 40 per cent in Mexico, from 15 per cent to 37 per cent in the Philippines and from 31 per cent to 46 per cent in Colombia. In other words, the baby boom in India continues unabated, with an average of 24 million births annually or 48 births each minute of the day and night.

The reason for this is not that the family planning programme has become ineffective since the disastrous forcible sterilisation campaign of 1976 but that it simply cannot cope with the escalating momentum of couples entering the fertility age-group each year—the number at present is 125 million and is expected to rise to between 170 million and 180 million by the end of the century. "Therefore", explains Rami Chhabra, programme director, communications, of the Family Planning Foundation, an independent research organisation, "every slight shortfall in targets has steadily created a backlog to the two million to three million new couples reaching the fertility age-group each year. For the family planning programme to register its impact, it will have to run all that faster to cover the cumulative increase in couples who need to be covered by contraception."

"The programme has had a bad history and it is imperative that we now create a positive climate, involve every body and dispense adequate supervision."

minister for health

A state-wise breakup further indicates that while some states, notably Maharashtra, followed closely by Punjab and Haryana, are forging ahead to cover almost half their fertility-level populations by contraception, the entire Hindi heartland of Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh, as well as Jammu & Kashmir, are lagging behind with hopelessly low contraceptive levels varying from 13 to 17 per cent. Therefore, while the Health Ministry from time to time trots out encouraging figures (a 14.7 per cent increase in use of contraceptive methods nationally in 1984-85 over the previous year with detailed breakups) the fact is that, in perspective, these figures mean little.

The latest ministry figures, however, reveal that the number of sterilisations have, in fact, registered a 10.6 per cent decline—from 45.32 lakh sterilisations done in 1983-84 down to 40.50 lakh in 1984-85. The reason for this, according to both the Minister for Health Mohsina Kidwai and Health Secretary Grewal, is that at the best of times the family planning programme remains acutely susceptible to political change, so that both the period of political uncertainty following Mrs Gandhi's assassination and the general elections caused serious disturbances, thereby affecting the number of sterilisations. Grewal admits that traditionally the season of intensive family planning campaigns has been from September to March with the summer months ignored by health workers and state health ministries. "This is something we are determined to change. Earlier we simply hadn't tried summer campaigns. Now it is imperative that our workers are in the field throughout the year," she said.

Still, Health Ministry officials are hopeful of meeting their targets for the year 2000. These are, to reach a net reproduction rate (NRR) of one, which means that every female leaving the fertility age-group will be replaced by one entering it, and that 60 per cent of eligible couples will be covered by contraception. Kapoor argues that while the Sixth Plan target may have fallen short, for the first time, the programme is poised to overshoot the Seventh Plan target of covering 42 per cent of eligible couples. His optimism is founded on the 1981 census which records the unprecedented fact of fewer children in the 0-4 year age-group (87 million) than in the 5-9 year group (93.6 million) or even in the 10-14 year group (85.7 million)—in other words, there are fewer children growing up to enter the fertility period.

The Health Ministry also points out two major shifts in the increased acceptance of birth control among women in the last decade: for the first time the use of the pill has registered a phenomenal increase (up from 5.5 million the users in 1983-84 to 9.3 million in 1984-85) and the trend in sterilisations shows a complete reversal from the 1970s when the number of men accepting sterilisation was much higher. The number of vasectomies in the 1980s has come down sharply in comparison to the number of tubectomies which is steadily rising (see chart). However, medical experts at Unicef point out that though this is a positive indicator, the increased number of women accepting sterilisation is made up of an older age-group, the majority of acceptors having already undergone an average of 3.7 births at the time of acceptance. "India is still unable to attract younger women to sterilisation," says a medical expert.

But the commonest criticisms of the Indian family planning programme, one of the oldest in the world though still the least effective in international comparisons, still remain the same: that too much power has been vested in government agencies and not enough outside; that all too often these agencies regard the exercise as a matter of statistics and not of people; and that if successful family planning programmes anywhere are linked to a process of integrated development, in India, the programme has been pursued in rigid isolation, thereby magnifying its political connotation.

"We need to adopt a caring, compassionate approach. Family planning is a matter of people, not statistics."

RAMI CHHABRA, programme director, communications, Family Planning Foundation

Medical experts and social scientists have reiterated the need to define such a coordinated policy. Only such an approach, they claim, could lead to the quantum jump required to meet the targets for the year 2000. "What we need to adopt is a caring, compassionate approach. And we need to link the programme with basic medicare, adult education, child development and anti-poverty programmes," says Chhabra "Any agency that has mass contact with the people should be involved," adds Avabai Wadia, president of the Family Planning Associations of India.

"We want to try out new techniques in the social marketing of contraceptives and the use of the information media in an unfettered manner."

SERLA GREWAL,
secretary, Health Ministry

Health Ministry officials admit the narrow ambit of the programme's functioning, and agree that much will depend on the shifts in the new policy to widen its scope, optimise the utilisation of its services and monitor the results. "The programme has had a bad history and it is imperative that we now create a positive climate, involve everybody and dispense adequate supervision," says Health Minister Mohsina Kidwai. Grewal delineates two major areas for future emphasis: one is to strengthen linkages between the programme and associated programmes such as child immunisation, maternity care, adult literacy and education. "This, of course, must be accomplished with a continuous updating of our own skills and resources: improvement in quality of our field workers, training programmes and rural services." And the other is to introduce a strong motivational slant via the media. For example, Doordarshan's most popular soap opera Hum Log, was originally to be funded by the Health Ministry in conjunction with the Ministry of Information & Broadcasting, but as the programme expanded beyond all expectations to encompass a staggering variety of characters and issues, family planning inevitably was shoved under the carpet. New plans are afoot to produce family planning-oriented programmes for television as well as consultations with the advertising industry for better, forceful campaigns. The famous Do Ya Teen Bas campaign of the 1970s, for example, has now got inextricably muddled with the 1980s campaign which recommends delaying the first child, spacing the second and eliminating the third altogether.

Rather like the campaigns for two successive decades which confusingly overlapped each other the country's family planning programme is desperately in search of new definitions for a full-scale revival. And only a careful, considered push from the top can give it the direction it now requires.

THE MAHABHARATA

An Epic Endeavour

IN THE lush countryside of Avignon in southeastern France last fortnight, the internationally-acclaimed theatre director Peter Brook's long-awaited version of the Mahabharata opened to a rousing reception as part of the year-long Festival of India celebrations. An estimated 25,000 people had booked in advance to see the three-fold cycle of the fourth century Indian epic which has taken 10 years to prepare and is being staged in a stone quarry outside Avignon. Adapted by Jean Claude Carriere, the eminent screenplay writer of Bunuel films who also recently wrote the scenario of Swann In Love and designed by Chloe Obolensky, the production in French is enacted by an international cast of African, Polish, French, Greek, Lebanese and Indian performers who form the nucleus of Brook's Paris-based repertory known as the Centre Internationale de Creations Theatrals (CICT). Indian dancer Mallika Sarabhai is a special import playing the part of Draupadi and observes that "working with such an international company of artistes I have paradoxically become more aware of my Indianness."

The excitement the play has generated has reached "fever pitch", says Alain Crombeque, the director of the Avignon Festival who believes it's one of Brook's most unusual forays in experimental theatre. For Brook himself, the effort has been more than an ordinary dramatic experiment, it has been a kind of mission to bring to life one of the greatest books of mankind. "The very fact that we did not know the Mahabharata and the West shared that ignorance with us was a terrible thought," says the gnome-like director who was fascinated years ago with the "image of a soldier who refused to fight the war in Vietnam by throwing away his gun" and understood it when an Indian writer brought him a copy of the Bhagvad Gita. "It greatly aroused my interest," says Brook, "and so I went to a French friend who is a great Sanskrit scholar and just as Ved Vyasa, the author of the Mahabharata, says that if a person listens carefully to a story he may not be the same person again, so Carriere listened to the story of the Mahabh and thought of sharing it with the p of the West."

Carriere's adaptation of the Maha rata follows the original translation Bhandarkar Oriental Institute in P Sanskrit edition, so that even Ind unless knowledgeable about the va parallel texts and stories, may fin French adaptation confusing. In its rety, the work is so stupendous th two Indian scholars could agree on a trayal of the same events. Still, the Fr have responded to the epic with siasm. To seek a preliminary reac the six-million franc-production tested it out in 24 preview perform in Paris spread from April though with only one of all three parts to on a Sunday.

The creative performance is in parts—The Game of Dice, Exile in the and The War—and compresses the by focussing on aspects that do not away from the essence of the epic. A the natural setting of the stone q through common devices such as a at the back and a pond of water up the five natural elements are included. And the simple costumes, in offwhite and neutral creams, solved the problem of colour. "Our aim was not to rely on authenticity but on suggestion," says Chloe Obolensky, the production's Greek costume designer. For scene changes, the performance further relies on the traditional piece of cloth used as the curtain in Kathakali, Kuchipudi and other dramatic forms in India.

One theatrical innovation the director has employed to condense the series of the epic and circumvent a literal interpretation of events is to introduce the character of a young child who asks Vyasa, the author-narrator, questions on aspects of the narrative. Thus well-known episodes from the epic such as the Kauravas wanting to kill the Pandavas, the setting of Lakshagriha, the palace of lac on fire or the marriage of Draupadi are retold in the form of questions and answers and seldom let up the intensity of the performance. And the child, witnessing the war, moving in the arena, holding up the curtain and questioning Vyasa becomes an alienation device reminding audiences that it is a story being told, and at the same time echoing the questions in their mind. For instance, when Krishna dies as a result of a curse and the hunter shoots an arrow, the scene is enacted with Krishna reclining, Vyasa and the child holding up the cloth, an actor walking up and placing the arrow between Krishna's toes and the child turning to Vyasa and asking, "But Krishna is dying, what did he tell Arjuna in battle?". Vyasa replies that the child must ask Krishna and Krishna says that he can tell the truth only once and passes away. The shooting of the arrow, the questioning of the child as Krishna's life ebbs away contrive to powerfully convey the message of dharma.

At other moments, the visual impact is as vital. When Duryodhana asks where Arjuna has gone to perform penance, a circle of fire springs up near the canal; similarly there are other strong images of the floating of the children in the Ganga, the birth of the Kauravas represented by a huge steel ball and

Duryodhana challenges Yudhisthira at the game of dice

Drona's archery tournament shown with flagged poles forming a square in which Arjuna and Karna confront each other.

Each of these scenes, and others like the deaths of Duryodhana and Bhishma, use devices from the traditional theatre forms of not only India but places like Bali and Formosa. Indian theatre forms such as the martial arts of Manipur and Kerala and puppet plays contribute to the wealth of dramatic devices used in scenes of war and mythology, such as the slaying of Abhimanyu or the drawing of Dushasana's blood.

In order to give the international cast an experience of the culture and people of India, the entire troupe travelled in the country two years ago. Once outside a Vishnu temple on top of a hill outside Madurai they were trying out a duel sequence when suddenly an impromptu audience gathered and watched in rapt silence. "It was a most moving experience," recalls Georges Corraface, the Greek actor who plays Dushasana. "They understood the battle between Arjuna and Shiva completely and it gave us great confidence." Many of the performers have spent time learning traditional music and dance forms of India. Alain Marat, the French actor who plays Vyasa, studied Kalaripayattu in Kerala, Kim Menzer the Danish musician, learnt to play the nadaswaram and shehnai and Toshi Tsuchitori, the Japanese musician has studied Hindustani vocal and Rabindra Sangeet. Some of these musical pieces are used in the performance: verses from Tagore's Gitanjali in Bengali as the Pandavas leave for exile in the forest lend an exquisite poignancy as do the playing of drums by a Japanese actor to presage the doom-laden sounds of war.

WHETHER in French or in any other language the Mahabharata is bound to make an enormous impression; but the fact that so far the West has never attempted it as a story for the theatre places Brook's production in a unique position. In part, the greatest problem has been of introducing all-encompassing Indian concepts such as the doctrine of dharma to foreign audiences. "I had to be very careful in using the exact French equivalents for such concepts as dharma and nyaya, or else it would be a case of perpetuating philological imperialism by using terms understood differently in European languages. Dharma has to be dharma and it has to make sense as the story progresses," says Carriere.

For both Brook and Carriere the discovery that there existed in the East an epic containing not only so many universal truths but truths that were of unique relevance to the contemporary world came as a great revelation as it does to French audiences who are flocking to see the Mahabharata. Already invitations to present the French Mahabharata are pouring in from Italy, Poland, Germany and the Soviet Union. The immediate task, however, is to produce it in English so that it can tour the United States and India, the country where it originated. "We hope to take the English version to India after our present engagements which extend till 1987," says Brook. The present text in French is to be published shortly by the CICT but for Carriere the ultimate accolade will be to see it translated someday into Hindi. "It would be the best reward," he says humbly.

Controversial though it may be in French for Indian viewers who do not understand the language, the English version may prove more suitable though it will also rouse reactions of all kinds. That is bound to be so in a mammoth text that has for centuries been open to a multitude of interpretations. And Brook's nine-hour-long spectacle contains intimations about man and the world as relevant in today's world as they were 1,600 years ago. "But," he warns, "we cannot drag the Mahabharata to our way of perceiving things. We cannot drag it in its entirety, this great inexhaustible river—heroic and sensual, comic and profound. We may, if we listen carefully, rediscover at its every moment our own anxieties, emotions, laughter, questions, contradictions or our most secret dreams. Or we may not."

TAMIL NADU

Fallen Hero

HE HAD the world at his feet. At 26, Suman Thalwar was already at the peak of his career. Tall and handsome, he was one of the top actors of the Tamil and Telugu screens, earning Rs 5 lakh per film and completely booked up to the end of 1988.

And then, suddenly, the bubble burst. On the night of May 18, a group of policemen arrived at Suman's house, seized some pornographic video tapes and arrested Suman. The charge against him, of course, was far more serious than the mere illegal possession of a few blue films. Suman was arrested on the basis of far more offensive complaints filed by three young girls claiming that he had abducted, raped and forced them to act in blue films. Overnight, the hero of the film industry became its blackest villain.

To make matters worse, 27-year-old Diwakar—also charged and sentenced in connection with the illegal possession of blue films—substantiated the charge against Suman. In his confessional statement he reportedly indicted the young actor as the brain behind a blue film operation designed to lure young, innocent girls, drug them and strip them for obscene photographs and films.

Events moved very fast after that. On May 21, Madras Police Commissioner Sathyal ordered Suman's detention under the draconian Goondas Act of 1981, an Act which allows the police to keep a person in jail for a full year without producing him before a magistrate. The police made the arrest non-bailable. On the detention order, the police commissioner clearly wrote "detention of Thiru Suman alias Suman Thalwar, goonda".

But last fortnight, the actor made the first move to prove his alleged innocence. Through senior advocate G. Ramaswamy, who usually represents top DMK functionaries, Suman filed a habeas corpus in the Madras High Court seeking his release and claiming that his detention was mala fide. A division bench of the court, while admitting the petition, ordered the issue of three weeks notice to the police commissioner and the prohibition and excise secretary, administering authority for the Goondas Act. The case for the prosecution is built on complaints filed by the three girls—Lakshmi, Beena and Sheela—against Suman. Their stories are more or less the same. Suman offered them a lift home, drugged them and forced them to pose nude for photographs. All three claim to have begged him to return the indecent photographs and one of the girls, Sheela, even claims that when she went to retrieve the offending snaps, Suman took her out in his car and threatened to shoot her. She jumped out of the car and fled. All three were ultimately forced to file complaints in the police station. Said a top police official: "It was on the basis of the complaints of Lakshmi and Beena that Suman was first arrested on the night of May 18. But on receiving information about Sheela's police complaint, it was decided to detain him under the Goondas Act."

Suman was arrested on the basis of complaints filed by three girls claiming that he had aducted, raped and forced them to act in blue films.

Suman contends that all the charges against him are framed. He claims to have never even seen the girls who had complained about him. The entire film industry seems to be suddenly speaking out in his favour. Said a film source: "Suman is very tall and handsome. It is the young girls who fall for him and not the other way around."

Film producers and directors have built a solid wall of defence around the popular hero. They vouch that on the days when Suman was supposedly abducting and raping different girls, he was, in fact, shooting for his films. Famous film director L.V. Prasad categorically stated: "Suman was with us shooting from around 9 a.m. (on the day he is said to have met Sheela at 9 p.m.). It was a tight schedule and shooting went on till around 10.30 at night. After that Suman went to see writer Sachiamurthy who was in a private hospital."

Of course the film industry is bound to speak up for Suman since it has a lot at stake in his release. He had at least three dozen films on hand when he was taken into custody. Nearly 10 producers, whose films starring Suman are ready for release, are growing more and more desperate everyday. Many others have paid large signing amounts and advances to the jailed actor. Film circles estimate that at least Rs 7 crore, if not more, is locked up with Suman.

Suman himself is quite aware of his current demand and is shrewdly cashing in on it. He has long sheets to prove his busy shooting schedules just when he was supposed to have accosted the girls. And argued a friend of Suman: "That girl Lakshmi complains of having been raped on April 20. Why should she have waited till May 10 to complain to the police? Beena says she was assaulted on April 21, and she waits till May 14 to make a police complaint." The answers are not hard to find. Said a police officer: "We forget that these girls had obscene films of them taken. So naturally they would first try to recover the films. Only when they realised they couldn't, they come to us in sheer despair."

The more obvious question, of course, is if Suman is not guilty why should the police pick on him of all persons. He has an ingenious answer to that too. "The case has been foisted against me," he states in his writ petition, "at the instance of a liquor baron who commands great wealth and an all-pervasive influence over the chief minister of Tamil Nadu as well as the second respondent, the commissioner of police." According to Suman's story, the liquor baron's daughter apparently eloped with Diwakar a fortnight before he was arrested and Suman was suspected to be in the know. This was the liquor tycoon's revenge. So, as the case trudges on with its plots and sub-plots and melodramatic twists, all eyes are focussed on Suman Thalwar, the upstaged god of the film industry. As in a suspense film, everyone is waiting to know the final denouement: is Suman the hero or is he the villian?

Money isn't everything!

What, you could well ask, what could be more important than a 124% increase in sales?

What could speak louder than Rs. 741 crores?

It's been a good year for Unit Trust. The figures speak eloquently. Total investible funds touched Rs. 2179 crores, with the addition of a record figure of Rs. 918 crores in the last year alone. A figure that defied all projections, exceeded all expectations. Sales under all Unit schemes went up to a staggering Rs. 741 crores. While the number of Unit holders touched 1.7 million.

And yet, what we are most proud of is the human story that the figures don't reveal at all. The fact that the family of Unit holders now includes more and more people like the small farmer and the village artisan. The Trust has just launched a new project called PURA (Promotion of Units in Rural Areas) in co-operation with various fertiliser companies. Under this project, the field staff of these companies will help spread the message of Units in rural areas.

The project has so far been implemented in two States, Tamil Nadu and Gujarat. Soon PURA will move to Kerala, Goa and Maharashtra... and then on to the rest of the country.

Unit Trust has now entered an important new phase in its 21-year old history. Changing traditional ways of thinking isn't easy, especially in a rural context. Selling a sophisticated concept like Units to a rural audience is a challenging task.

Challenging yes, but rewarding too.

Get away from a grey world

Cold surroundings . . .
concrete jungles . . .
hazardous wastes.
Pollution that could strangle with its poisonous coils.
Hardly the place you wanted . . .
to start in . . . to grow in.

As an industrialist, you can opt for a better environment. To begin with, when you think of putting up a new factory . . . why go into thickly industrialized locations ?

Gujarat has several industrial locations with all the facilities of the big townships without the attendant crowding.

Besides being close enough to major markets. The Industries Department, the Gujarat Industrial Corporations and the Gujarat Pollution Control Board can give you a choice of several attractive alternative locations.

Give this a clear thought.

HINDI FILMS

The Age of Insecurity

WHICH films will sell now? Five years ago if you had asked this of Gulshan Rai, the old patriarch of the film industry and its acknowledged crystal-gazer, he would have come up with a veritable menu card: an Amitabh Bachchan action movie with a revenge theme thrown in; a "multi-starrer" between Amitabh, Rishi Kapoor and Shatrughan Sinha; a "lost and found" story; a "separation and reunion" story, and so on. But now Rai is wiser and grimmer. Which films will sell now? Sitting at his Tardeo office, Rai shakes his bald head and says: "I'll give you anything if you can tell me that."

Never before has the Indian movie industry felt so insecure as it does now. Of the 734 films made last year, only Chhota Chetan, the 3-D Hindi remake of a Malayalam children's film, was rated as a super-success by Trade Guide, the authoritative journal of the movie industry. In 1983, there were as many as six films in that category. So far this year, and upsetting the predictions of nearly all pundits who keep their fingers on the pulse of the movie industry, only one film—a soppy melodrama called Pyar Jhukta Nahin—has come up to the winning post by grossing over Rs 3 crore in six months flat against a modest production budget of less than Rs 50 lakh. On the other hand, the expensive bombs—films made with budgets of over Rs 1 crore—present a depressing list. Yudh, Aandhi Toofan, Sarfarosh, Hoshiyar, Sitamgar, Zamana—the casualties of this year—are both colourful and extensive. "A long winter has set in on the film industry," says N.N. Sippy, the newly elected president of the Indian Motion Picture Distributors' Association (IMPDA), adding that "what amazes us more at present is not the audience's force of acceptance but that of its rejection."

Post-mortem of both successes and failures is an ongoing exercise in the show business. But what is most stupefying is the erratic distribution—themewise and in terms of the overall packaging—of the recent hot-sellers. If Arjun, a film full of violence, action and contemporary political message, had crashed virtually everywhere other than Bombay, there was yet another film, Ardh Satya, also a spin-off from the common Hollywood ancestor, Deathwish, which did creditable business all over the country. And if Aaj ki Awaz had kept the cash register ring[illegible] is Awaz, which is indeed an echo of its [illegible] decessor, that flopped at the box-[illegible] While top-flight distributors are at [illegible] wit's end trying to solve the puzzle, [illegible] is a pattern that seems to emerge u[illegible] ticed. As Amit Khanna, theorist [illegible] mass cinema and film maker, put[illegible] "What is distinctly in is the type of [illegible] that puts skill and craftsmanship a[illegible] content. What is distinctly out is the [illegible] sociological concern of the late '70s."

For all their dissimilarities in [illegible] proach, the more successful among [illegible] film makers in Bombay today are tech[illegible] cally way ahead of their predecess[illegible] Subhash Ghai and Rahul Rawail, bo[illegible] whom are under 40 and have four [illegible] grossers of the past three years to th[illegible] credit, are now respected in the indus[illegible] for their workmanship. Ghai made [illegible] 1984 blockbuster, Hero, which is mer[illegible] humdrum boy-meets-girl story but [illegible] deemed by its superb technical gloss. [illegible] wail's Betaab too is a flimsy picture-[illegible] love story, an adaptati[illegible] of the age-old format [illegible] Taming of the Shrew, bu[illegible] is the hallmark of super[illegible] craftsmanship that le[illegible] film all the way to the [illegible] of the chart. Even [illegible] Jhukta Nahin, th[illegible] recent box-office [illegible] tion, has on it the [illegible] of clever execution. [illegible] maker, Chander S[illegible] nah, is an acknowle[illegible] specialist in sleek [illegible] tion who had once [illegible] Victoria No. 203, a [illegible] box-office smasher.

It is quite remark[illegible] that many of the top [illegible] tributors, who have [illegible] ears ever fixed firm[illegible] the ground to detect [illegible] the subtlest shifts in p[illegible] lar taste, have now [illegible] talking more and [illegible] a film's "visual te[illegible] rather than its story [illegible] tent and cast line-[illegible] Rai puts it: "The story [illegible] taken a backseat. SAAGAR

Back to Love

TEN YEARS ago, when steam locomotives and bandit horsemen ran side by side down a strange mountainscape to form the opening scene of Sholay few expected that the film would create movie history with 25 crore people watching it over the years. And, like the hero who mounts Pegasus, director Ramesh Sippy found it difficult to live up to his achievement. He opened up a dazzling array of smart gadgetry, in the best tradition of James Bond films, in Shaan—but the audiences found it too remote and did not buy enough seats at the theatres. Later Sippy had a fling at heavy doses of drama in Shakti, but that too left the viewers cold. And when the industry had all but written off Sippy as a failure, he is ready with Saagar, a film as different from Sholay as a Clark Gable romance is from a John Wayne western.

Yet there is a strong underlying similarity between the two films. Like Sholay...and only like Sholay... Saagar is purely a director's film. If Sholay had picked up the story-line from "spaghetti westerns", Saagar also gratefully acknowledges its debt to Casablanca and many other romantic Hollywood films of the '40s. But, like in Sholay, Sippy once again drowns story, drama, characterisation, music and all the other components of a film under an all-pervasive textural pattern. From the opening shot, where the camera draws lines and arcs in the air to portray the fisherman's village by the sea, one knows what Sippy is trying to get at. He seems to be saying: "Look, I'll give you a Mills and Boon story on celluloid, if you like. But that's only an excuse to hold you down here. Now, you better watch the film, because the film is only the film."

As the shots begin to unfold, one understands why it cost Sippy Rs 70 lakh to create the village alone. For the expenses...and the long time by the seaside (it took two-and-a-half years to film it)... show not in the stacking of gaudy properties but in the inner weave of the film, the internal harmony of its texture. The village is far from naturalistic: it is only in tune with the film's choreography. And Sippy makes no leones about it from the moment Kamala Hasan appears on screen, playing a stylised fisherman with an electrifying presence.

Dimple Kapadia, who plays the daughter of a restaurant-owner in the village, and Rishi Kapoor, playing the grandson of a rich heiress and fishing magnate, at once get identified as the idealised Romeo-and-Juliet pair in the film. Kamala Hasan loves the girl but the girl is in her turn in love with his friend, Rishi. The trigonometric problem is inevitably solved by the bullet that comes in too late.

Trite? Yes, that's what the 'story' is. But who indeed cares when Sippy is just grabbing his audiences by the hand to transport them into a world of pure cinematic fantasy, a world filled with the tireless music of the surf running along the level sand of the beach, the glorious sunrises and the sunsets, the catamarans and the heady taste of feni. And the brilliant clowning of Kamala Hasan expresses a sexual surge that runs through out the film.

Rishi and Dimple: passion play

It is perhaps the most non-psychological film ever made on the commercial screen, an equivalent of the triangle between Kamala Hasan, Rishi and Dimple is almost Euclidian in its two-dimensional inflexibility. Equally unambiguous are the others on the cast: Madhur Jaffrey as the rich grandmother; Shafi Inamdar as the villain; Saeed Jaffrey as Dimple's father. But the weight of this fable-like film is carried neither by the flimy story nor by the dialogue. It is carried by the deep passionate images. These are the images of lust as well as innocence; of merriments in a country tavern which are as rumbustious as a village fair; of the featureless rocks on the sea-shore desolate against the sky—framed in a manner that is sure to evoke memories of David Lean's unsung classic, Ryan's Daughter.

The final magic of Sippy's film is felt when the images join up without a single shot appearing to be idle or expendable. Even in the scene, where Dimple is seen by Rishi taking her clothes off before a swim, the screen time is stretched with such brilliance that one forgets which to admire: the skill of camerawork and editing, or the lady's charm. Either way, it is Sippy's execution that commands the ultimate respect. No wonder that this scene was finally shot after 80 retakes.

"Perfectionist" is a word that is very often used in Bombay's film industry in the pejorative sense. In a profession where everyone works extra shifts to keep down cost and earn more money in a shorter time, Sippy's leisurely art is a sure butt of criticism—especially if it fails to earn enough money. It is also known that the priciest component in the Rs 3.2-crore extravaganza was—time. But a film like Saagar could not have been made on the assembly line. It was edited down to its 80-minute length from used raw stocks of 20 times that length. Nor was it easy to sell. Its impending nationwide release of 103 prints on August 9 has been possible only because Sippy's father, G.P. Sippy, also the producer of the film has undertaken to distribute it in most places. "It is too big a gamble, yes," says Sippy, tense.

Yet the gamble is worth it. For Saagar, shows how craftsmanship can be stuffed into a commercial format. In its reckless extravagance, and in its almost rebellious spirit to free cinema from the clutches of narrative, Saagar remains Sippy's one from the heart.

What the ISPAT group has done in Indonesia, it is now poised to do in India!

Turnover up from Rs.5 crores in 1978 to over Rs.70 crores in 1984.

Assets up from Rs.15 crores in 1978 to over Rs.90 crores in 1984.

Now promoting NIPPON DENRO ISPAT, the first project for the manufacture of thin gauge galvanized sheets in the country with latest technology from NIPPON DENRO, JAPAN at Kalmeshwar, Nagpur

PT Ispat Indo, Indonesia — a joint venture promoted by Mr M.L. Mittal and his associates, is a modern integrated steel mill complex. One of the country's most successful joint ventures abroad, the story of PT Ispat Indo is a story of astounding growth. Turnover increased from Rs.5 crores in 1978 to over Rs.70 crores in 1984 registering an average growth rate of over 220% per annum.

With the same spirit of enterprise, the group has now promoted in India NIPPON DENRO ISPAT LIMITED to set up the country's first Galvanized Steel Sheet Project for manufacture of both plain and corrugated sheets of thin gauge.

Using the latest technical know how from the renowned NIPPON DENRO of Japan, the plant incorporates the state-of-art technology with fully computerised control and monitoring systems.

The project is ready for trial runs and commercial production is slated in August, 1985.

And soon Nippon Denro Ispat Limited will offer you an opportunity to share its future — a future of growth and rewards.

Watch out for an announcement of the Public Issue.

conversion are: Ramesh Sippy, whose Saagar (see review) defines the pinnacle of craftsmanship on the commercial screen; and Yash Chopra, who, after years of living down the image of making action-packed and overly dramatic films, such as Deewar, Trishul, Silsila and Mashaal, is now making Faasle, a simple love story which he has striven to film stylishly.

Khanna says that the "social anger" of the movies of the mid-'70's is being constantly subjected to "the law of diminishing returns". He is obviously referring to the genre of films that became immensely popular after Prakash Mehra's Zanjeer (1973) and Chopra's Deewar (1975). Deewar, for instance, was a parable on the life of Haji Mastan, the reformed smuggler. Zanjeer was a take-off on the well-known Hollywood revenge tale, Death Rides a Horse. The apotheosis of the genre of revenge films came of course with Sholay (1975), a film inspired by the spaghetti westerns, which became a legend as time progressed, running in Bombay's Minerva theatre for five years at a stretch, at Jyoti in Calcutta for over two years and at Delhi's Plaza theatre for over a year.

The formula worked up to a point, catapulting, in the process, into fame and money a matinee idol like Amitabh Bachchan and the writer-duo, Salim and Javed. It was Javed in particular who brought into the scripts the taut, earthy language of the poor districts in Indian cities and high doses of raw physical violence. However, with the passage of time, violence and anger tended to get passe, and the simplified confrontations between the rich and the poor lost their edge. It is difficult, in commercial cinema, to rationalise either a failure or a success. But scores of films bombed in the recent past because of their overt psychological twists, mindless violence and strident, if not false, sociological concerns. Even Javed Akhtar's proverbial innovativeness was reaching an intellectual plateau. Duniya, Mashaal and Zamana, his toughly-worded violence-prone scripts, were flops in a row.

"It suddenly became very expensive", says Sippy, "to mount violence and action on screen in a credible manner." He calculates that it may cost him Rs 10 crore now to make an action film of the same intensity of Sholay: it cost him Rs 3 crore at the time of its making. In the past 10 years, the price of raw stock has gone up by 60 per cent, star prices by 75 per cent, theatre rentals by 40 per cent, the price of print and publicity by 50 per cent and the cost of hiring technicians by another 50 per cent. But the number of exhibition theatres has increased only marginally—from 10,120 in 1975 to 12,634 now. The actual number of tickets sold has remained by and large stationary because of the proliferation of video parlours and extension of private video showing facilities. And the net yield to the industry from each ticket sold, after allowing for entertainment tax, has gone up by only 22.5 per cent. Explains Rai: "Even a success on the scale of Sholay, at today's cost of production, is not half as worth achieving as it would have been 10 years ago".

As producers began scaling down their production costs, violence and action became less and less sustainable on screen. Rhapsodises Khanna: "It signalled the return of a lot of good things, technical polish for instance." The first evidence of the wind of change was Ek Duuje ke Liye, an inexpensive but exquisitely mounted film which has grossed more than ten times its modest production cost of Rs 50 lakh since its release in 1981. Ek Duuje ke Liye was also the first commercial success of a film based on a simple, romantic theme since such subjects went out of fashion with Kapoor's Sangam in the mid-'60s. The success of Rawail's Love Story a year later further defined the trend. Even Javed was pulling new tricks out of his bag. Rawail's next film, Betaab, based on a Javed script, confirmed the final transition in popular taste. And now, Saagar, by far the most expensive love story ever on the Indian screen, will show the extent of popularity of the genre. "The success of Sippy's Saagar will definitely show us the way," says Rawail.

Javed, who has written the story and screenplay of Saagar, frequently talks of "genre films"; that is, films that show the outermost limits of popularity of a particular genre. According to him, both Devdas and Main Chup Rahungi, the two most popular tear-jerkers of the '50s, defined the maximum possible scale of success of the particular type of films. Sholay spelt out the limit to which the people could accept violence and gore in cinema. And now the industry will try and plumb the depths of Saagar to find out how much of money is exactly left in the sweepstake for well-made desi versions of Mills and Boon romances.

MADHU GADAKARI

Prabhakar: anniversary song

'Dracula': musical message

◆ What a circus, what a show. Evita has gone to town—and how. June 30 Alyque Padamsee's rock opera on the Argentinian first lady celebrated its 100th performance in India—under the new old name Evita II—leaving Bombay completely razzled and dazzled. Of course it was the same old wine but in a shiny new bottle. To celebrate her 100th coming of stage, born-again Evita decided to turn over a new feather. Out went the dull black tuxedos, the tacky evening gowns, the worn-out sets. On came the furs, the frills, the Ritz itself. "We're really going all out for glamour," said leading lady Sharon Prabhakar. But what was her big night really like? "Oh, for me, it's always the first night," came the unusually coy reply.

◆ Last month, she was sitting behind her desk at the Housing Development and Finance Corporation in Bangalore, going through ponderous legal volumes. Then she became Miss India—and, still, much hasn't changed for Vanita Vasan. "I don't want to act in films," she has been pleading to the film producers. "I want to do a course in sales and marketing. It changes a person's life-style." Well, her life-style changed a good deal anyway when she marched up the catwalk and stopped right beneath the Eve's Weekly-Miss India crown held in the hands of Meenakshi Sheshadri, herself a winner of the same title four years ago. Soft-spoken, 21-year-old Vanita measured a perfect 10, a perfect 10 inches apart, that is. With a figure that reads 35-25-35, Vanita can forget about boring financial statistics and concentrate on Tokyo where she will participate in the international beauty pageant next month.

◆ That was the beauty. Now for the beast. Launching a nation-wide attack, end of July, is Count Dracula himself, the original terrorist. The count obviously wants something fresh to sink his buck teeth into. To get his first taste of India (and Indian flesh), the king of vampires will arrive with his entourage of lesser demons in a show called Dracula Spectaculla, performed by the Essex Repertory Theatre Company. But, horror of horrors, the dirty old devil has been put into a n fangled musical and b made, indeed, almost man.. Tribal Trail

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's tour of tribal areas in Madhya Pradesh and Orissa resulted in a sudden rush by officials to give the areas a face-lift and much-neglected relief. But the tribals are sceptical of any dramatic changes in their lives.

Cabaret-bars featuring skimpily-clad dancers have flourished for long in Kerala. But growing protests from feminist leaders forced the state Government to shut down the bars recently, leading to further protests from the owners and, more vocally, from the dancers.

"The geometry factor in art, introduced by early Egyptian architects and artisans, has had a lasting impact on aesthetic concepts of today.

In fashion, the elements of geometry come as a liberating relief from the dominance of floral items. The geometric line becomes the fashionable stripe, the point and circle, a dot, the square, a block. Add to these the cube, zig-zag, diamond and arc and we have a panoply of shapes, simple permanent. Since these shapes are fundamental, they allow ground colours to have full play. "Geometric" is the new story line for Garden-Vareli fabrics — trendy, futuristic...in keeping with image of the modern woman as a liberated one."

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

NEWS, like the rains, seems to come in cycles. Sometimes it happens that newsmagazines like INDIA TODAY haven't hands enough to cope with what is going on, like at election time. At others, they're like drought-stricken farmers anxiously scanning the skies for signs of hope. So it was last fortnight when staffers at the fortnightly news meeting, at which major stories are planned and discussed, found themselves in a news drought. But when the news came, it came in a deluge. The announcement of the Rajiv Gandhi-Longowal pact on Punjab on July 24—just two days before deadline—compelled us to pull out all stops. This is the 11th time Punjab will be on the cover since the magazine's first cover on Punjab in March 1979 and it has been the magazine's most frequent cover subject next to Mrs Gandhi. Quite naturally, in the course of reporting it, several of our writers have gained an intimate knowledge of the subject and the dramatis personae. So, even though time was short it was possible to divert our Punjab veterans on to the story all at once and cover its various aspects.

Principal Correspondent SHEKHAR GUPTA and Chief Photographer BHAWAN SINGH, having tracked Longowal in Delhi departed for Chandigarh and Anandpur Sahib where the Akali Dal met to discuss the accord. Principal Correspondent SUNIL SETHI and Photographer PRAMOD PUSHKARNA made for Amritsar while Chandigarh Correspondent GOBIND THUKRAL, who was following the story from his vantage point, sampled opinion in the city whose fate had just been decided and travelled into Haryana to gauge the mood there. To assess how the accord was received, INDIA TODAY also commissioned MARG (Marketing and Research Group) to conduct a snap opinion poll in Punjab, Haryana and Chandigarh. And having tracked Punjab through its worst moments, putting the story together was a particularly gratifying experience. Says Gupta, who has written this issue's cover story and done seven previous ones on Punjab: "Covering Punjab through this period of turmoil has been like becoming part of the depressing story. But this time there was a refreshing change in mood. There is no euphoria but there is hope."

Punjab has been a festering open wound on the body politic of the nation. And its skillful suturing by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has removed the gloomy question mark which has loomed over the country's future for the last four years. Hopefully the accord will bring normalcy to Punjab—because if it does not, the consequences are too calamitous to contemplate. The Government has reached a point of no return. It has dealt all its cards and now it is up to the Akalis to bring Punjab back into the mainstream. Besides the relief over the Punjab agreement there is almost universal contempt and disgust for the antics of those politicians who fiddled while the state burnt, for the years of grief suffered due to the delayed settlement. And there is fear that the present accord may well be sabotaged by self-serving power-hungry politicians. Although the Punjab crisis has revealed this ugly side of Indian democracy, it has also shown that where there is a political will, settlements can be made on the negotiating table and not the streets. It is a time for healing, a time to affirm a renewed faith in democracy.

STOCK MARKET REFORMS

Thanks for the excellent cover story on stock-markets ("The New Money Spinner", July 31). With the increasing number of investors and the falling value of the rupee each year,it is very essential that we have some standardisation for the benefit of not only the investors but the industries too. First, the financial year for all the companies should be the same as the national financial year, that is April to March. The value of each equity share should be the same in all cases and there should be marketable lots of 50 each, uniform in all cases. All preference shares should be gradually redeemed and no more preference shares issued. Shareholders should be allowed to exercise the option of accumulating their dividends with the company so that whenever the rights shares are issued these can be adjusted against them.

Pune — R.N. BHIDE

■ I was surprised by your cover story. While nationally the so-called investors (more approximately, roulette players as subconsciously admitted by your cover) have gained by some Rs 15,000 crore so far this year, the rise in prices of most stocks is quite unrelated to respective increases in plant, machinery or technology. If unrestrained speculation is not curbed and controlled, it will affect not only the investors but the country's industrial production itself.

New Delhi — R.S. PHADNI

■ No doubt black money is one of the factors responsible for the stock-market boom. As Arvind C. Dalal put it, though it is an evil, if it comes into shares it is put to productive use and supports the corporate sector. It is wise to allow black money into the stock-market.

Madras — R. SRIKANTA

PATHETIC PLIGHT

It was appalling to learn that children are being sold by their mothers in Kalahandi due to acute poverty and drought ("The Agony of Kalahandi", July 31). The Orissa Government has done precious little to provide succour to these tribals and on the contrary, brazenly denies all that is taking place in this dry belt. What is most distressing is that while we munificently collect aid for the drought-hit of Ethiopia, the plight of our own people fails to stir our pachydermal conscience.

Calcutta — ARVINDER SINGH WALIA

WHAT'S IN A NAME

It is quite disturbing to know that the products sold under the Philips label have nothing to do with the much-touted "Dutch touch" ("Name Game", July 31). The singlemost important reason why people prefer Philips India products is that they take for granted that their quality is matched to those manufactured by the Dutch parent company. This kind of taking the consumers for a ride will definitely result in the erosion of credibility. Under these circumstances, what better reason is needed for people to go in for imported electronic stuff which is contemporarily designed, is way ahead in quality and a lot cheaper.

Ottapalam, Kerala — N. SUKUMAR

TRYING VIEWING

You only draw it mild when you say "the content of official domestic news programmes is laughable when it doesn't have to be" ("The Media Message", July 31). The fact is that it is highly redundant, trying and full of synthetic peptalk that cannot take us far.

Ranchi — NAVIN SINGH

■ Your comment on the media was one-sided. While commenting on media autonomy, we should not compare ourselves with western countries. Their socio-economic structure is altogether different from what we have in India. We have problems like casteism, communalism and regionalism. We are far behind in national unity and integration too. In such a society, complete autonomy for radio and TV is something unrealistic. It may even cause danger to our democracy. We still have to wait for long years to come.

Vasai, Maharashtra — VIJAY B. BHANDARI

TIMELY WARNING

The report "Water Supply: Drying Up" (July 15), is a timely warning against unscientific and unplanned exploitation of ground water everywhere in the country. Already a nation-wide estimate has painted a grim picture for the future. None of the states has so far adopted the 'model Bill' formulated by the Union Agriculture Ministry years ago for the scientific exploitation of ground water. I do hope that the present Government would see to it that this bill is adopted throughout the country as soon as possible.

Lucknow — M.A. QURAISHI

MISNOMER

Thanks for the eye-opening article on narcotics ("The Growing Threat", July 15). Unfortunately, the story gave the wrong name of the doctor who runs a de-addiction centre in west Delhi. He is Dr Harish Bhalla, not Hareesh Bhatia.

New Delhi — MAHENDRA SINGH & OTHERS

SAFFRON CAESAR

"Justice delayed is justice denied" is the moral that emerges from the Secunderabad conspiracy case ("A Protracted Process", July 15). It also drives home three points. One, that the British unleashed terror and confined it to their political opponents. Second, that the post-Independence rulers have been amending this strategy and using it to institutionalise terror. And third, that NTR has been scuttling all liberties with his despotic ways. Only, repression in the regime of the "saffron Caesar" is not confined to any particular group. Whoever voices dissent is immediately branded and victimised.

Vijayawada — B. JAGANNADHA RAO

PAID FOR

This refers to your report "Share Mystery" (July 15). You say that I had not paid for shares that Mr Harish Bhasin had bought on my behalf and that Bhasin was left holding the baby. This is for the first time that I have heard that some shares were purchased for me but not paid for. As far as I know I have paid for every share purchased on my behalf. Mr Bhasin has never told me that there were any shares purchased on my behalf on which payments are due.

The Punjab Lessons

PRIME Minister Rajiv Gandhi has reason to be satisfied. In signing the Punjab accord he has kept his promise to the Indian electorate, that Punjab was his number one priority and that he would move to solve it as soon as possible. That he should have been able to reach an agreement within five months of setting the ball rolling in March is a magnificent feather in his cap. The future cannot, of course, be taken for granted. There is still anger in Punjab and there are still misguided people, probably in large enough numbers, who do not see the accord as a positive step. There are people who will remain dissatisfied, who will work against it. But given time and deft handling—and some luck—there is no reason why peace should not return, why Punjab should not once again become the beacon of progress it was and its people regain the exuberance they have for so long been proud of.

Yet even as the country savours the moment, it must also remember that there are other problems seemingly as intractable, such as Assam and Gujarat, that the future may well bring new eruptions of disaffection, that new problems will rear themselves in the years ahead. It is vitally necessary that the Punjab experience be re-examined for the lessons it teaches us because some of the mistakes of the past four years are being repeated in a different context and on a different scale in Gujarat.

The first lesson has to do with the too-little-too-late syndrome. The Punjab agreement contains very little that sets it apart from earlier negotiations. By all accounts, each of the points that has been agreed upon could have been achieved during the abortive and sometimes secret discussions in 1982 and 1984. From the standpoint of July 1985, with the accord an accomplished fact, this might seem like quibbling but much the same thing happened in Assam. The differences between what the student agitators wanted and what the Government was willing to yield is today no narrower than during the prolonged discussions that stretched over so many months, and it took bandh after bandh, strike after strike to bring home the seriousness of the problem and get the Government to act. Now, much the same has been happening in Gujarat. Former chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki was allowed to continue in office long after he had lost the moral right to do so. The promised reservations were given up some four months after the agitation started when good sense had long suggested this should be done much earlier. And, nothing was done to rein in the police till the appointment of J.F. Ribeiro last month.

The second lesson is that as long as politicians seek to exploit such problems for their own gains, there can be no solutions. This happened with the Akalis. It happened in Assam where the Government's primary objective was to achieve power and deny the students any public gain. In Gujarat, the reservations agitation has, thanks to political meddling, acquired the additional dimension of communal rioting. The agitation started because of Solanki's exaggerrated promises to the backward castes before the election which sparked off that particular prairie fire.

A third lesson is that a government that lacks credibility lacks ability. The story of Punjab is, in one sense, the story of the decline of New Delhi's credibility—whether it was because of suspected links between some Congressmen and Bhindranwale and other extremists, or the farce over Bhindranwale's arrest or even the political manoeuvres that won the ruling party the government in Haryana at the cost of peace in Punjab. In Assam too, the problem was widely seen as the creation of the Congress(I) politicians who turned a blind eye to and even encouraged illegal migration and then enrolled them in the voter lists so that they could win power. In Gujarat, suspicion of the state Government's bonafides is the unkindest legacy that Chief Minister Amarsinh Chaudhary has inherited from Solanki whose ability to cope with the agitation and killings decreased in proportion with his declining credibility.

A fourth lesson is that a government that appears to be weak and indecisive can make no great headway in tackling political and social problems. From a position of some strength in 1981 Mrs Gandhi's political fortunes plummetted. The shakier and more paralysed her government seemed in its handling of Punjab, the bolder became the extremists. Rajiv Gandhi, who has the unprecedented backing of some 400 MP's in the Lok Sabha, was able to seize the initiative and make whatever concessions he needed to precisely because he spoke from a position of strength. In Assam, too, the agitation continued for several years and it was no act of governance that took the wind out of its sails; the catharsis came after the massacre of Nellie. What has happened in Gujarat cannot pass for decisive government either.

Finally, it is abundantly clear that all these problems are in essence political problems. People, in general, do not want violence. What they want is justice. Punjab persisted because, for too long, it was treated as a law and order issue. Assam has yet to be tackled politically. And in Gujarat the political initiatives are long overdue. The Punjab accord has signalled that given determination, a spirit of compromise and genuine goodwill it is possible to achieve the seemingly impossible. It has encouraged hopes for a similar settlement in Assam where there seems to be new confidence in the Centre's willingness and ability to make honourable agreement. It should, similarly, send the right signals in Gujarat and there is no reason why the same level-headedness should not come to prevail. And if the right lessons are learnt from the bitterness of the recent past, it might just happen that India, a country known sadly for its social conflicts and sectarian violence, would now come to be regarded as a nation which has learned to live in harmony with itself.

HAPPY ENDING

■ "All's well that ends well." It was the bard of Avon who uttered that seemingly fatalistic platitude a long time ago, but like most of the things he uttered, there is a heartening ring of truth to it. Rajeevi of Mangalore would be perhaps the first one to testify to the sanity of the poet.

She was to marry Ishwara Poojary last fortnight and all was set for the wedding at a temple in Mangalore when the slips between the cup and the lip began to manifest themselves. First and foremost, there was no sign of Ishwara and although the Hindu religion provides for a lot of things, it cannot sanction a marriage when the bridegroom is not around. What was present, however, was a sub-inspector of police called Santappa who declaimed to the excited gathering—Rajeevi's father had prudently decided to faint—that Ishwara was already married, was the father of two bonny children and that his first wife had lodged a complaint. Upon which Rajeevi burst into tears. "Never fear," said the lordly youth Taranath, 30, of good family, who stepped in and offered to redeem the situation by marrying the sobbing bride-in-waiting. Santappa gave her away.

PRIVILEGE LEAVE

■ The enduring pastime of Indians appears to be to stay away from their jobs as long as they can. The leader of these magnificent men with their unsigned musters is likely to be Nanubhai Umrabhai of the Surat Municipal Corporation (SMC). Umrabhai is a 'bedlar'—whatever that means—at a corporation swimming pool and he left the pool, apparently never to return, on April 20, 1978. He reported back for work on June 30, 1980, after a prolonged absence of 858 days.

During that time, he had reportedly gone abroad to some more paying job—the SMC is not the most munificent employer in the world—and had made, if not a fortune, enough money in the bank. Then for some odd reason the pull of the water became too strong for him and he once again breathed the heavy chlorine-laden air of the pool.

The SMC board obviously liked the man's sense of loyalty. They debated for a short while and then sanctioned him 177 days leave with pay and 681 days leave without pay. Nanubhai, incidentally, has already drawn his salary for the 858 days.

TABLES TURNED

■ If anyone was to dispute the fact that India is adding an Australia to its population every year, all he or she has to do is to travel by train with the sweaty, hoi polloi in the second class.

Last month, nearly 150 people were doing so in a compartment supposed to carry half that number on the Bombay-Goa route. There was no conductor. Two indignant-looking men and their families were standing squashed up in a corner near the toilet because the people who had captured their berths refused to give up their hard-won resting places. Ultimately at Pune, the two men decided to do something about this injustice and called in the police. The inspector posted a guard at the door and went through the compartment with a fine lathi. He ordered that only those with confirmed berth reservations were to be let back inside.

Halfway down the queue, he was confronted by the two civic guardians who explained sheepishly that they had lost their tickets in the melee. The inspector refused to even consider the idea—the two families had to book fresh tickets to wherever they were going, and by the next train. It doesn't pay to be virtuous all the time.

EXAM FEVER

■ It was a quiet afternoon at the examination hall, the silence punctuated only by the scratching of several leaky pens dashing off illegible replies to obscure questions in the hope of getting the diploma in higher education offered by Bombay University. Suddenly the invigilator paused in his tigerish round. Was that...? No, it couldn't be....But of course it was....And he leapt with joy....

On seeing Professor Hemant Wagh, dean of the Faculty of Arts and director of correspondence courses, sitting diligently at a table, his roll number card clutched in a hot little hand and his pen flashing furiously over the paper as he gave liberally of great erudition.

The university was agog with excitement. Not because Wagh has no right to garner another degree or diploma if he wants to but because the examination is conducted by his own department. And because he is the member of a committee which recommends the appointments of examiners for university examinations. To call that a ticklish situation would be understating the issue.

Suzuki's quest for the ultimate has brought them to where they are today. They go to any length to get the right component to make the perfect product.

So now, when Suzuki are collaborating with Maruti, it cannot be just any battery for their car. It has to be specially designed to meet exacting performance standards in relation to weight, be fail-safe, provide optimum starting performance and last the longest.

Exide is the only battery that comes through with flying colours. With their technical expertise backed by the experience of Indian conditions, Chloride, makers of Exide, have developed a special battery that not only matches exacting international standards, but also stands up to the tough operating conditions in India.

With the Maruti-Suzuki on the roads for over a year, Exide has justified the faith placed in it.

So others will follow suit. Such as DCM-Toyota, Swaraj-Mazda and Mahindra Peugeot, to name just a few. In every case they have specified Exide.

Ask them about Exide. They will tell you that Exide batteries are the best.

Kite-flying in Japan is more than a pastime. It symbolises man reaching out for the stars in his eternal quest for the ultimate.

PUNJAB

BREAKTHROUGH

FOR FOUR traumatic years, it had held an entire country to ransom, growing into the biggest and bloodiest crisis in independent India's history. It succeeded in alienating a community, raised the ugly spectre of terrorism and secessionism, and caused the cold-blooded killing of thousands, including the former prime minister of India, Indira Gandhi. Now, in the hands of her untried son, however ironic the reversal of roles, the Punjab crisis finally achieved the breakthrough that only days ago had seemed unattainable.

Akali leaders at Anandpur Sahib meet: discordant notes

BHAWAN SINGH

Till the other day the emotional and communal divide in Punjab had seemed unbridgeable, but all of a sudden now peace had a chance. At the culmination of a week's work at frenetic pace, the prime minister and his key aides,

Count Down

IN NINE months the human organism reproduces itself. It is fitting that the birth of hope in Punjab should have taken almost exactly that long after the last cataclysmic violence assaulted its psyche in the assassination of prime minister Indira Gandhi and the killings that followed it. For the tragedy that has stalked that once joyful land has been nothing more nor less than a human tragedy, a gory tale of mass suffering and pain because of the clash between the warped ambitions of a clutch of misguided men and a wooden, self-serving government. Had anyone suggested before it all happened that such characters would stride the national stage and such events unfold, he would have been labelled a Cassandra. But the events did unfold and the characters did step into the limelight.

Take Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale. His message of hate rang loud but those in authority who should have silenced it chose, for their own narrow purposes, to turn a deaf ear to it. The result was predictable: Hindus and Sikhs, brothers for centuries, fell out. Bhindranwale and his men had a field day, picking on easy targets. Sikhs who stood up to them were slain, Hindus were killed at random. They wanted to sow hatred, to break the bonds of centuries.

Operation Bluestar, a military manoeuvre with hardly a precedent, was a who had sat up continuously for two nights poring over the various aspects of the accord over endless cups of coffee and sandwiches, had cause for relief. They had worked on the Punjab problem as their first priority and now the effort was bearing fruit. And the relief was just as overpowering among the Akali leaders, with the agony of Bhindranwale's bullying, long jail terms and incarceration of their community at the back of their minds. A beaming Longowal said as he walked out of the prime minister's office after signing the accord: Guru dee kirpa naal eh hoya" (This happened by the grace of the Guru). And proclaimed his key associate and former Punjab finance minister Balwant Singh: "The period of confrontation is over."

That statement, more than anything else, summed up the overpowering sense of relief which overtook the country. For four years now people, chased relentlessly by the shadow of extremism, were praying for just such a deliverance. Here was an assertion of the collective will of the nation, especially the people of Punjab. If the accord was symbolic of the Government's new conciliatory approach on national problems it was also an emphatic Akali rejection of secessionism. The sense of relief was widespread. The mood was summed up by an Indian Express editorial which said: "The prime minister and his colleagues will be hailed by a grateful nation.... Mr Harchand Singh Longowal and his advisors have shown great statesmanship, fortitude and courage in rising above the bitterness of the long overdue, last-ditch attempt to rid the country of Bhindranwale's armed marauders and destroy the spectre of Khalistan. But a greater damage was thereby done. The Sikh community, which had unsuccessfully wrestled with the moral dilemma posed by Bhindranwale, found conviction: Operation Bluestar was not a cleansing of the temple, it was an attack on the temple. A whole community felt humiliated, injured, its religious susceptibilities assaulted by the destruction of the Akal Takht. For a while it seemed that Bhindranwale had achieved in death what he failed to achieve in his lifetime: a break between Hindu and Sikh.

Rajiv Gandhi and Governor Arjun Singh: secret diplomacy

Take the Delhi riots of November last year. With the entire Sikh community seething with anger after Operation Bluestar, it seemed only a matter of time before something gave way. Something did, with the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. Tragedy piled upon tragedy. Rampaging mobs heaped indescribable horrors on Sikhs. And left behind a community in rage and in pain.

From the vantage point of November 1984 it seemed impossible that sanity could ever prevail, tempers cool, that peace would return. But the pendulum has swung. How long, after all, could the country be at war with itself? It was time to heal the wounds, to leave behind the bitterness of the past. That hasn't happened quite, but a new hope has been born. It is fragile and may not endure, but if it is nurtured properly it can reach a full flowering.

past. This is a victory for all." Calcutta's Telegraph headlined its comment: "Thank you Rajiv, Thank you Sant." And the feeling in Punjab was echoed in the words of Cookie Maini, a college lecturer in Gurdaspur, who said: "The last two years have been lived in such tension and day-to-day uncertainty that sometimes it seemed your entire life was going to pieces. At least, this agreement denotes security for the common people."

The agreement had miraculously lifted clear the thick pall of gloom and fear which had held the country in a cruel bind for over four years. Not that the relief was universal. It led to anger and consternation among the pro-extremist elements like the United Akali Dal and the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF), whose members clashed violently with Longowal supporters as he returned to the Golden Temple. Armed with guns, swords, lathis and kirpans, the two factions' clash outside the Akali Dal office in Amritsar last week, left several injured. But the fact that the breakthrough had come despite a widening split among Akali factions, in no way subdued its importance.

Too much blood had spilled in Punjab for there to be much rejoicing, but there was an overpowering feeling of relief that the long wait was over, that for once the negotiations had escaped getting bogged down in technicalities and suspicion. The prime minister and his key aides, including some of the cabinet members and Punjab Governor Arjun Singh, who played a crucial role in bringing about the accord (see box), had much to be proud of and more to be thankful for. "These were the most tense moments of my life," an official involved in the deliberations recalled later and disclosed that "even while the accord was being worked out, the prime minister was worried about the possibility of extremists sabotaging the talks as they had often done in the past." In fact, the final round of talks had barely begun when a message landed at the Punjab Civil Secretariat in Chandigarh directing officials to strengthen security measures.

For over six weeks both the officials and Akalis had lived under the shattering burden of tensions. But once the prime minister and Longowal sat for their first round of talks a rapport was struck immediately and the mood of anticipation was transparent even among Longowal's supporters who, on the day of reckoning sat in the anteroom of his VIP suite in Punjab Raj Bhawan playing cards with Punjab policemen, who had driven in from Punjab, protecting Longowal against prowling extremist hitmen. But on this afternoon they were men full of banter and many slept using the butts of their rifles as pillows, as if looking forward to a period of peace. The passage to the accord had been far from smooth and straight. So high were the stakes that the prime minister, who led the campaign personally from the word go, had even taken the extreme step of deliberately keeping out of the proceedings President Zail Singh, who was often consulted by Mrs Gandhi on Punjab. Similarly Buta Singh and Darbara Singh, two other Punjab Congressmen who have strong lobbies back home were kept out of the deliberations. The gains now were too precious to be frittered away.

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

Longowal flanked by Barnala and Balwant Singh leaves Parliament House after signing the accord with the prime minister: seizing the initiative

The success was the culmination of a process that began in the second week of March with the Government ordering Longowal's release. This coincided with the appointment of Arjun Singh as the new governor of Punjab. In retrospect now, it is easy to see the key elements in the Government game-plan. Firstly, the idea was to let Longowal re-establish his leadership among the Sikh masses and strengthen both his hands and the government's credibility through a series of concessions. These began with the release of the Akali leaders in stages. Then came the initiative in April, including an inquiry into the Delhi riots, release of many young detenus and lifting the ban on the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF).

As part of the same approach the Government was restrained in its response to Longowal's belligerence. The think-tank around the prime minister consisting of the three-member cabinet subcommittee on Punjab and Chief Parliamentary Secretary Arun Singh decided that this hawkish posture was necessary for Longowal now to regain credibility among the Sikhs. The approach soon paid off as Longowal's posture changed dramatically. He first welcomed the April initiative and later, was prompt in his condemnation of the bomb blasts in Delhi and the suspected terrorist involvement in the Air-India Jumbo crash. Slowly, the Government was getting the right signals from Punjab.

The impact of the change was also being felt in Chandigarh where Arjun Singh shrewdly continued to expand the scope of behind-the-scenes efforts. By the end of May, both he and the Akalis had begun talking in terms of a package deal. This also marked the beginning of a series of 14 meetings that Arjun Singh had with the Akali leaders (see box). In the course of these. Arjun Singh decided to put his money on Longowal. He never seemed like losing. It was touch and go and Delhi knew that even Longowal would panic in case the information on the secret talks leaked out. Says Arjun Singh: "That secrecy was the key to success. If we had failed there the accord would never have come about."

This also marked the beginning of what some Akali leaders light-heartedly call Longowal's pen-friendship with the prime minister who first wrote to him in July firmly making an offer of talks and a package deal. Longowal replied promptly and the ground was set for the prime minister's July 17 letter inviting Longowal and his aides for talks in Delhi.

But for all his good intentions Longowal is not exactly known to be a man of iron determination. He soon found himself torn between contrary pulls and pressures within his party. His key aides, former chief minister Parkash Singh Badal and President of the Shiromani Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC) Gurcharan Singh Tohra pleaded with him to go slow, saying, "With such great difficulty we have been able to re-establish our leadership now. If the talks fail all will be lost."

In Chandigarh, Arjun Singh had sensed this mood and advised the prime minister to seize the initiative. And he decided to take charge of the proceedings himself. In the second week of July, he called Longowal on the telephone and told him reassuringly: "You come, we will accept your demands as well as we can. Punjab belongs to you much more than to us all." Longowal still tried to persuade Badal and Tohra at meetings held in Chandigarh on July 22 and 23, first at Balwant Singh's house and then at the SGPC's Sector-5 office. But failure of the persuasive mission did not discourage Longowal. He decided to seek "advice" from the holy Guru Granth Sahib.

In a solemn-moment at Balwant Singh's house he performed the Sikh ritual of seeking a "vak" from the scripture. This means opening the book at random, reading the first verse on the page and deciding the future course of action on the basis of its interpretation. On July 22, the Guru Granth Sahib told Longowal to "act courageously and stop being in two minds on vital questions." "It wasn't such a difficult decision after all, I just followed the order of my Guru," Longowal says now. But he was tense. "For Santji it was a question of the takht (throne) or takhta (chopping block)," a key Longowal aide was to remark later.

OPINION POLL

Public Support

WITH the agreement between Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and Akali Dal President Harchand Singh Longowal marking a watershed in the history of the Punjab problem, INDIA TODAY *commissioned Marketing and Research Group (MARG), a leading independent market research agency, to gauge public opinion on the agreement by conducting an opinion poll in four cities —Delhi, Amritsar, Chandigarh and Hissar —and two villages—Khatkar Kalan on the Chandigarh-Jalandhar road in Punjab and Bhiwani, adjacent to Bhiwani town in Haryana.*

A snap poll of this nature, with its limited geographical scope and relatively small numbers, does not necessarily reflect the mood and opinions of the total population in Punjab, Haryana, Delhi and elsewhere, but it does provide pointers.

The pollsters conducted 1,207 interviews over three days (July 26-28) in the six centres, selected because they were among the places that had borne the brunt of the Punjab problem, or whose future was involved in the transfer of Chandigarh to Punjab, or because they were politically sensitive. The interviews were divided almost equally between men and women, and an effort was also made to obtain a representative sample of Hindus and Sikhs.

In all, 404 interviews were conducted in Delhi, 201 in Chandigarh, 201 in Amritsar, 200 in Hissar, 101 in Bhiwani and 100 in Khatkar Kalan. The interviews were conducted with adults who claimed to be aware of the agreement. As expected, the level of ignorance was extremely low. The findings of the poll have been statistically 'weighted' in order to provide an unbiased perspective. MARG*'s report:*

Few agreements to settle domestic disputes would appear to have had the widespread sanction and approval of such large numbers as that reached last fortnight between Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and Akali Dal President Harchand Singh Longowal. Among both Sikhs and Hindus the response to the agreement is overwhelmingly favourable, but the polling centres in Haryana showed a greater degree of dissatisfaction over the agreement, and could be a pointer to possible trouble. The majority also expects the situation in Punjab to improve consequent to the agreement.

▶ Reactions to the agreement

Except for the centres in Haryana —Hissar and Bhiwani—the overwhelming majority of respondents approved of the agreement between the prime minister and Sant Longowal. In the three cities of Delhi, Chandigarh and Amritsar, Sikhs were particularly keen supporters of the pact, with over 90 per cent of the respondents in each case voicing their approval. Even in Hissar though the support was more muted in comparison to the other cities, two-thirds of the respondents were in favour of the agreement vis-a-vis just more than a fourth of the respondents who held a contrary view. In Bhiwani, however, those backing the pact were outnumbered three to two.

▶ Reactions to the transfer of Chandigarh to Punjab

Interestingly, two-thirds of the respondents in Chandigarh were favourably inclined to the transfer as against 31 per cent who disapproved of its loss of status as a Union territory. Sikh residents of the city were the most enthusiastic backers of the scheme, with 88 per cent expressing their approval of the transfer. In all other centres, with the exception of Bhiwani, a clear majority of those interviewed (from a low of 67 per cent in Hissar to a high of 93 per cent in Amritsar) were in favour of Chandigarh being transferred to Punjab. Sikh residents in Delhi were also unanimously in favour of the shift in the status of the Union territory. In contrast, 61 per cent of the respondents in Bhiwani were aggrieved by the transfer.

▶ Rajiv Gandhi's handling of the Punjab problem

In the four cities where the poll was conducted, the overwhelming majority of respondents supported the prime minister's handling of the Punjab problem. In the villages of Khatkar Kalan and Bhiwani, however, he could only muster the approval of a little more than 40 per cent of the respondents. In consonance with their overall distaste for the agreement, Rajiv Gandhi's critics in Bhiwani outnumbered his admirers 4:3.

▶ Opinions on the extent of the compromise by the Government and the Akali Dal

In Chandigarh, Delhi and Amritsar the clear majority of respondents believe that the agreement reflects a compromise on the part of both the Government as well as the Akalis. This conclusion is emphatically endorsed by 82 per cent of the respondents in the Sikhs' holy city of Amritsar. In Khatkar Kalan, a Sikh-dominated village located between Chandigarh and Jalandhar, though 47 per cent felt that both sides had compromised, as many as 31 per cent were of the opinion that the Akali Dal had conceded too much ground. Quite the opposite view prevails in Hissar and Bhiwani, where the Government has incurred the wrath of more than two-thirds of the respondents who felt that it had surrendered too much ground to the Akalis. Even in Delhi, a significant 36 per cent of the respondents feel the Government has compromised too much.

▶ How the agreement will affect the current situation in Punjab?

With the sole exception of Bhiwani, the poll shows that the vast majority of respondents are hopeful of a turn for the better in Punjab because of the agreement. In Chandigarh, Delhi and Amritsar, the Sikh fraternity is particularly sanguine about the prospects of a return to normalcy, with more than 80 per cent of the respondents in each of the above cities cherishing such a belief. Respondents in Bhiwani, however, have a more gloomy outlook, with only 30 per cent supporting the view that the situation is likely to improve while 56 per cent believe it will remain the same.

To sum up, it appears that the Gandhi-Longowal agreement has widespread support. The undercurrent prevalent in each of the centres is positive, ranging from overwhelming support in Amritsar to cautious satisfaction in Bhiwani. If the vox populi in these centres is any indication, Rajiv Gandhi has certainly managed to hammer out a winning truce.

In retrospect the accord is also a tribute to Longowal's mutation from a stuttering, indecisive and spineless figurehead into a political personality in his own right, a transition that came all of a sudden in the wake of the challenge to his position by Baba Joginder Singh in May. Earlier, Longowal had been content with playing second fiddle. First it was to Badal, who way back in 1979 manoeuvred the installation of Longowal, then a relatively nondescript religious preacher, as president of the party to upstage his arch rival Jagdev Singh Talwandi. Then came the Bhindranwale phase peaking in 1982. He took charge of the Akali Dal morcha through a temple coup and left Longowal sulking in silence for two long years. But he must have done some serious rethinking on his own political future in the course of his 10-month detention.

On his release, Longowal was a changed man; belligerent, vocal and pining for the spot left vacant by Bhindranwale. At a public meeting near Moga on April 6, he declared: "It is a lie to say that Bhindranwale had so many arms in the Golden Temple. Let them give us all that ammunition now and try taking the Golden Temple from us." Stoutly refusing to condemn Mrs Gandhi's assassination he went to the extent of saying, "Why Mrs Gandhi alone? I mourn for all those who have died in Punjab over the years." His demeanour changed as he found himself more secure. But the greatest turning point was the May Day assault on him by Baba Joginder Singh, the ageing father of Bhindranwale who led a breakaway faction pushing Longowal into a corner from where he had no choice but to fight. And he had to fight from the moderates' side of the fence.

The victory in the battle against Bhindranwale's father gave Longowal a hitherto undiscovered sense of confidence. Says a senior government official: "It firmly established his credentials and also gave us new hope. After all, it is so much easier to deal with a well-intentioned politician rather than an old man whose son was killed by the army or temple high priests whose vision is limited.

The same rapid transition was evident in the way Longowal took the decision back to his people, shrewdly avoiding the Golden Temple at Amritsar where Baba Joginder Singh and his AISSF storm-troopers were planning a hot reception for him. Instead he opted for Takht Keshgarh Sahib at the town of Anandpur Sahib, considered second only in religious importance to the Golden Temple. Realising that persuading his younger party-men to accept the accord will certainly nvolve a bit of a hard sell, Longowal took a leaf out of Bhindranwale's book. He unabashedly told a rather modest gathering of Sikh youths at Anandpur Sahib: "This (the agreement) is a victory for the panth. This is an agreement signed not once but on each page. This is as good as a treaty between two countries. Not since the era of Maharaja Ranjit Singh has such an agreement taken place between Punjab and Hindustan."

Yet he was aware that such populistic rhetoric was good only for the young troopers. The chieftains in the party hierarchy were bound to ask some inconvenient questions and tensions were evident. Badal curtly turned down news photographers' repeated requests to pose for a picture with Longowal, murmuring, "I am sorry, let's not do this drama," and even while leaving the room for the meeting hall, announced clearly: "There are differences on each point." And though Tohra was quiet he maintained a tell-tale sullenness throughout. The battle at Anandpur Sahib involved strong ambitions. For Longowal and his supporters it was a crucial opportunity for encashing the credit of having secured the accord. But Badal and Tohra, left out of the talks had their own problems. They saw the fresh assembly elections round the corner and realised that they had been left quite far behind.

This desperation showed once the meeting began and both Badal and Tohra pulled out all stops. "My able friend Balwant Singh," said Badal sarcastically, "wants us to believe we have achieved a victory. But will he explain to us what is the meaning of this accord? We have lost so much on the river waters alone." Badal went on to say that what the Akalis wanted was firm decisions and not commissions. In the same emotion-laden voice Badal charged Longowal, Barnala and Balwant with having made a sell-out on the Anandpur Sahib resolution and angrily asked them what business they had "having rasgullas with a parliamentary affairs minister who marked the houses of Sikhs in Delhi for slaughter last November." Tohra raised similar questions and, at one stage even threatened to walk out. Newsmen waiting outside could distinctly hear an alarmed scream "don't let Tohra saab go" and he was obviously physically pulled down and then persuaded to stay on.

But Longowal had come prepared. Displaying his newfound confidence he threatened to quit in case the agreement was not accepted unanimously. Realising that in the present mood it was unrealistic to take on Longowal, Badal and Tohra beat a tactical retreat though it did not stop them from sulking afterwards. "All I can say is I am not happy," Badal told INDIA TODAY later. But there was very little doubt that, after two very eventful decades in Akali politics Badal now found himself a beaten man.

Longowal and his aides later decided on the second stage of the operation, to win acceptability for the accord among the rural masses. "Our mass contact programme will begin shortly," said Barnala and neither he nor Longowal were underestimating the serious challenge there. In the villages as well as cities there exists a strong AISSF hardcore which will settle for nothing short of what Bhindranwale had wanted and its mood as well as strategy was evident in the reaction at the Golden Temple (see box) and elsewhere in the state.

ARJUN SINGH

Hidden Moves

IN THE front seat of the Indian Airlines flight IC 421 to Chandigarh on July 26 sat a contented figure sipping coffee from a modest plastic glass. With the biggest success of his political career behind him Punjab Governor Arjun Singh was coming home triumphant. "See you in Ahmedabad now," said an American correspondent leaving for Anandpur Sahib after a brief press conference at the Chandigarh airport. "I did not know you were such a well-wisher of mine," quickly retorted Arjun Singh.

Light-hearted cracks apart, Arjun Singh must have been laughing up his sleeve. In March as he was suddenly flown out to Chandigarh from Bhopal, less than 24 hours after he was sworn in chief minister of Madhya Pradesh there had been widespread speculation on whether it was a promotion or demotion. "Many thought I had been kicked upstairs from Madhya Pradesh. But the importance of the assignment showed the confidence the prime minister had in me," he now casually says.

Singh had to contend with an unhappy legacy, of the departure of four governors in fairly quick succession and unhappy circumstances. All his predecessors in the troubled period, except B.D. Pande had lacked the will take the bull by the horns. But it must be said to their defence that they never had the kind of support from Delhi that Arjun Singh was promised. Arjun Singh was promised Delhi's full backing the moment the prime minister told him of his new charge—curiously while he was waiting at Palam airport to get the list of his cabinet members cleared by him.

In Bhopal it is often said that one key reason behind Arjun Singh's success was his excellent rapport with the media. He was conscious of this in Chandigarh as well and indeed began his campaign of peacemaking with the media. Says he: "When I met the prime minister on my way to Chandigarh I asked him to lift the press censorship first of all. And when I addressed my first press conference in Chandigarh that change had taken place." But both in Chandigarh and Jalandhar, the regional newspaper centre of Punjab, he enjoyed a thoroughly friendly relationship with the press. Ultimately he was even able to use the services of at least two well-known editors in order to establish contact with the Akalis.

From the day he moved into the Raj Bhawan he began sending feelers to the Parkash Singh Badal expresses his grievances after the Anandpur Sahib meeting: upstaged

(Bhindranwale's predecessor) called Baba Jagir Singh is now in residence, minding his charge of an assortment of young acolytes, all extremely sceptical about the accord. Said Sohan Singh: "It is all wrong. Longowal alone went off and made a settlement with the Government without taking into account the feelings of the whole community. He has no mother or sister of his own, or else he would have felt shame for the atrocities committed upon our womenfolk during the storming of the Golden Temple."

A local woman called Gurdip Kaur from a nearby village who had come to perform sewa in the gurudwara was louder in her recriminations against the accord. "Rajiv has bought Longowal with cash. If he were actually sincere about satisfying the Sikh community the first thing he would have done is to visit Punjab himself and apologise to the Sikhs for destroying Harmandir Sahib last year. But it hasn't even struck him to come to Punjab since he became prime minister."

Similar sentiments were in evidence at the Golden Temple. Surat Singh, secretary to the United Akali Dal and Baba Joginder Singh's chief spokesman announced that a massive Sikh conference was to be called in Manji Sahib in early August to denounce Harchand Singh Longowal's "deal and package with the Government". He said that leaders of all religious taksals, Sikh foundations and organisations, the Akali Dal and representatives of minority communities would be invited to attend. "We are now considering taking up the morcha that Longowal and his cohorts have abandoned These are the men who swore in the sacred presence of the granth that they would not give up the morcha till the Anandpur Sahib resolution was accepted. Now that they have betrayed the panth, it is our duty to carry on the agitation."

The basic points that the detractors of the accord make are:

- that army deserters should be given back their jobs, i.e. exonerated, as opposed to being rehabilitated;
- that the Government should publicly apologise for Operation Bluestar;
- that all cases be unequivocally dropped against terrorists and hijackers;
- that these men, along with other detenus, be released immediately.

It is obvious that as the hardliners chalk out their strategy at their August meeting the list of objections will lengthen. But, unless the Longowal group now suddenly displays a total lack of the art of communication they should not cut much ice, for a majority of the Sikhs realise that the Centre could hardly have conceded more ground than this. In fact there is a widespread feeling in Delhi that the Government, in its desperation to ensure that the talks did not fall through: gave away too much. "They have given them so much, what have they gained in return? If nothing else they should have at least asked them to condemn extremism and declare that they will not allow their shrines to become arsenals and sanctuaries of extremists," asked BJP President Atal Behari Vajpayee, adding, "this was a climbdown. The Government did not involve states like Haryana and Rajasthan whose interests were intimately connected with the accord."

The Government spokesmen, however, argue that the price for failure at these talks would have been prohibitive as it could have meant the political destruction of Longowal and total breakdown of communication between the Akalis while, at the same time, trying to project himself as a different kind of administrator. He visited the Golden Temple in Amritsar and made an eloquent note in Hindi in the visitors' book, saying, "prabhu ke is ghar mein meri yeh prarthana hai ke meri sewayen sweeker hoon." (In this house of God I pray that my services be accepted.) On the administrative plane he shuffled his advisors and saw the back of R.V. Subrahmanyam, the Assam cadre officer who had acquired a hawkish image. He also set a hectic pace for himself, keeping a 16-hours a day work schedule and often flew from one corner of the state to the other to personally supervise the administration. He gave top-most priority to redressal of grievances and that established his credentials with the common population.

His approach to the Akalis initially drew tepid response. But around the end of June his feelers were beginning to get the kind of response he was awaiting.

Singh's aides disclose that he had to iron out innumerable problems in the course of his 14 meetings with the Akali leaders—seven with Longowal, four with Badal and three with Tohra. His greatest success lay in convincing them of his good intentions. His strength was his disarming demeanour and self-effacing manner. "He is such a gumsum (quiet, unpredictable) person," a senior Punjab Congress(I) politician once said about him. Added Harpal Singh Bhullar, an Akali leader from Ferozepur: "Punjab would have been saved from the tragedy of Operation Bluestar and Mrs Gandhi's brutal murder could have been avoided if Arjun Singh had come here two years earlier." That could indeed be a little far-fetched and hypothetical. But there is no denying the significance of the role Arjun Singh played behind the scenes in the build-up to the accord though he himself modestly dismisses this as "a victory of commonsense."

Government and the Akalis. "All along," said a senior official, "we were forced to do tight-rope walking. But it was soon clear that we could not please all the sides."

In South Bloc, the answer was found in bureaucratese. As a matter of fact the waters question, which was the major stumbling block so far is also the vaguest part of the accord. It tries to please the Akalis without giving too much away and is thus open to different interpretations. By far the only positive, firm point in the accord is that the Sutlej-Yamuna Link (SYL) canal on which Haryana has already spent over Rs 100 crore and sacrificed over Rs 700 crore in crop losses would be finally completed by Independence Day next year. This means a bit of a concession by the Akalis. Earlier they were never able to defy Bhindranwale's logic in demanding from Haryana an equivalent amount of land as was used for digging the canal in territory belonging to Punjab.

That apart, the clause is unclear on everything else. For example, while the canal has been agreed upon the accord does not specify where its water will come from (see box). The Akalis recognise these problems but they do not want to jeopardise the accord by making a public issue of it. At their mass contact meetings which began with a camp organised by the party youth wing at Anandpur Sahib, the Akalis are trying to project that while the accord protects the quota of water that the state was drawing on July 1, 1985, only the remaining water will now be subject to adjudication by the tribunal and thus Punjab only stands to gain.

Similarly in spite of the reservations expressed in private Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal and his Irrigation Minister Shamsher Singh Surjewala talk publicly of only the advantages the accord could bring for them. Said Bhajan Lal: "We have no doubt that the tribunal will be fair. Our current share of 3.5 million acre feet (MAF) remains unaffected and our genuine need is twice as much. We have no doubt that we will ultimately be able to get enormously more than our present allocation."

Not everyone, however, shares his optimism. Former chief minister Devi Lal who led a campaign against the Government, accused it of selling out on the water and land issues. Birendra Singh, who was once the irrigation minister in Devi Lal's cabinet accused Bhajan Lal of misleading the people by claiming that Haryana will continue to get 3.5 MAF arguing: "The Government of India has played a cruel game with Haryana and over the past few

AMRITSAR

Still Tense

IN A WAY Amritsar is where it all began, and where the four-year-long agitation for Akali demands climaxed last summer in a confrontation of agonising brutality. As the epicentre of the Punjab crisis, the town has lived on a knife-edge of tension for too long. Perhaps the repeated lacerations of terrorist violence, political horse-trading and bloodshed in the recent past have numbed its memory of a better time, because a day after the Sant Longowal-Rajiv Gandhi accord last week there were few signs of open public approbation. If one expected jubilation in the streets, scenes of touching emotion like Sikhs and Hindus hugging each other in renewed brotherhood or distributing sweets, no, there was none of that. There was a sense of relief, however, in people's voices, as if a reprieve had unexpectedly been granted in the middle of a life sentence. And perhaps great relief, if the injury has been deep and the cure unimaginable, is not a feeling that can be easily expressed.

In the area around the Golden Temple the lanes were bustling, the shops loaded with merchandise, and people, unheedful of knots of policemen every few yards, did their daily business. Conversations were easy to start (they were never difficult, except in the last year or so when residents became easily nervous, and in their state of jitters, often gave exaggerated or evasive accounts) and the large community of Amritsar's traders, Sikh and Hindu alike, were vocal about the political settlement. "It's the best thing that happened to the business community," said Jagdish Raj, a cloth merchant who has run a shop in Katra Jaimal Singh for the past 25 years, "because for us the threat was double: as traders we would have had to down our shutters for good and as Hindus look for a livelihood elsewhere." Two shops away, another cloth merchant, Devinder Singh, echoed his sentiments: "The point is that Amritsar's agony has ended. Okay, some Sikhs may think that the accord doesn't give them their due. But, then, this is the group that created the situation, and kept it on the boil for so long."

Elsewhere, in the city's homes, colleges and offices similar opinions were being expressed, with people in saddened tones sometimes asking why such a solution couldn't be effected two years ago. But inside the Golden Temple, views were at sharp variance: the silence in the Akali Dal offices and the Guru Nanak Niwas, usually the hub of all activity, bordered on gloom; posters with crude rhymes attacking Longowal had been spattered on walls; a pair of shoes had been ignominiously hung outside the gate and effigies of the former morcha dictator burnt with gusto amidst catcalls from a gang of All India Sikh Students' Federation (AISSF) volunteers. In blazing saffron turbans, AISSF boys read aloud slogans on posters with Longowal's face blackened: Lungiram ne kita ki/ Dhokha, thuggi, 420 (What did Lungiram do? He deceived, robbed and hoodwinked) or Longowal ne pai hatti/ Qaum vechke kiti khatti (Longowal started a shop/ And sold his community for profit). "This isn't an agreement, it's a straight deal, a sell-out," said Swaran Singh, the 24-year-old treasurer of the AISSF. And Surat Singh, secretary of the United Akali Dal led by Baba Joginder Singh, accused Longowal of betraying the ancient Baba by first giving him a written undertaking that he would abide by his decision and then going off independently to negotiate with the Government.

United Akali Dal General Secretary Surat Singh accuses Longowal of betraying Joginder Singh by first giving him a written undertaking to abide by his decision but later negotiating with the Government.

Small crowds collected as these men elaborated Longowal's "betrayal": specifically, they would have insisted on a total exoneration of Sikh deserters from the army; asked the Government for a public apology for Operation Bluestar; insisted on an all-India inquiry into the November riots; released all agitation detenus and dropped all on-going cases against them. The audience simmers in agreement. A young, well-dressed man (he said he was a city businessman but wouldn't divulge his identity) spoke out: "The real Sikhs will carry on the morcha, now that the morcha dictator has run to Delhi like a beggar." And Surat Singh, a United Akali Dal official, produced a sheaf of letters and telegrams received from Sikhs world-wide condemning the accord. "We strongly condemn treacherous agreement...We strongly condemn betrayal of Sikhs by Longowal ...he has sold the rights of the Sikhs" read a cable from the committee of a gurudwara in Gravesend, U.K.

The callous obstinacy of these men, their populist rhetoric and pernicious posturing are reminiscent of the early crowd-pulling ploys of Bhindranwale, whose garlanded photographs today sanctify their offices. Similar rabble-rousers may be heard after the accord in rural gurudwaras, drumming up drained passions. But there is a new semblance of sanity in the consensus of popular opinion in Punjab's cities. In the crowded bazar outside the Golden Temple, a teashop owner whose stall was more than once the target of terrorist attacks during 1984's hallucinatory reign of terror, says: "I know those fellows have been in mourning ever since they heard of the accord. But let me tell you, if they're up to any dirty tricks now, they'll get beaten up by the people. The people simply won't risk losing their peace again."

History has a way of repeating itself, but also of imprinting its immediate lessons upon those who live it first-hand. A fractious clergy or political agreements or elections may or may not provide a solution for the short term. In Amritsar today the people have learnt that in the long term they alone can defend their own peace. —SUNIL SETHI in Amritsar years the state's share has been reduced to 2.8 MAF. Why is this injustice being done to us? What is our fault?"

Similar doubts were expressed in Rajasthan, the third state affected by the river waters question. In an unprecedented move last fortnight the entire Opposition in the Rajasthan Assembly sat in dharna protesting against the accord. Even Chief Minister Harideo Joshi initially committed the indiscretion of rejecting the accord. But though he was summoned to Delhi and "persuaded" shortly afterwards, doubts persisted. Said the BJP's Jaswant Singh, who happens to be the only opposition MP from Rajasthan in both houses of Parliament: "It is amazing how they can decide an issue concerning Rajasthan's interests without consulting the state. In any case who is the prime minister to decide on such an issue by himself?" While the Centre has now conveyed to the Rajasthan Government that the state's present share of water will remain unaffected popular doubts are summarised in Chief Minister Joshi's telex to the prime minister which reads: "Inclusion of the state of Rajasthan (in the accord) seems wholly unnecessary and contradicts the substance of reference to the proposed tribunal. Insistence of the inclusion of Rajasthan seems to be designed by the party concerned to create complication in actual flow of water from headworks into Rajasthan."

The other inter-state aspects of the accord are confined to Punjab and Haryana. Haryana, for example, has to think on terms of a new capital now. "We shall take a final decision on where to locate our new capital once the Hindi-speaking areas of Punjab are transferred to Haryana next Republic Day," says Bhajan Lal who is constituting committees including members of all political parties and town-planners to take the decision. The possible contenders are Hissar and Panchkula. Hissar is fairly centrally located in the state and has a mini-secretariat and an agricultural university. But the chances of Panchkula, adjoining Chandigarh seem brighter. Nestling in the Shivalik foothills it has scenic surroundings. The Government has already acquired large chunks of land there and if the Mani Majra village of Chandigarh gets transferred to Haryana, as expected, even the area around Panchkula will become sizeable. The Centre is likely to release a generous amount to Haryana for building the capital though it can be nowhere near the Rs 1,000 crore that Bhajan Lal is demanding.

The Government will have to act quickly on the capital project as the state will soon face the problem of shifting thousands of government employees out of Chandigarh. As a matter of fact they are the ones with the most genuine grouse against the accord. A majority of them face the prospect of shifting out of Chandigarh in the middle of their children's academic session.

But inter-state rows were not the only stumbling blocks on the way to the agreement. Insiders reveal that on many occasions the talks reached close to the breaking point on the question of the army deserters, many of whom are currently being put through court martials. The Akalis wanted a total amnesty for them. "But," says Arjun Singh, "the prime minister made it clear from the very outset that there could be no compromise on army discipline." The clause relating to the deserters is also rather vague but the most plausible interpretation is that all the Sikh soldiers who are dismissed from the army on the charge of desertion or indiscipline will be given vocational rehabilitation. While Akali hardliners consider this inadequate it pleases a number of former Sikh generals who had signed a memorandum to the President seeking lenient treatment for the deserters. Retired Lt-General Harbaksh Singh said: "I am reading between the lines and presume that the court martials will take a lenient view of the cases. Also, that the sentences awarded so far will be reviewed and remitted as was done in the case of the Indian National Army (INA) soldiers. Most of the Sikhs did this out of their religious conviction and because they were completely confused and rudderless. In many cases their officers had got scared and run away. It was a failure of command."

But the same clause draws sharp comment from another former soldier, BJP MP Jaswant Singh, who argues: "Court martial is one of the most painful decisions an army has to take and it is a serious matter. Now this agreement really means that if the court martial sacks a soldier he will immediately be rehabilitated. That pre-empts the very idea behind the exercise." Similar doubts persist on both sides on the issue of special courts and treatment of suspected extremists. The Akali hardliners want total abolition of special courts and release of all those detained under the National Security Act while many in security agencies and particularly Punjab police feel that the Government is being too soft. Arjun Singh, however, defends the decision to be soft on the Sikh youth, saying: "Many of them have been released in the recent past and that has not led to any increase in violence. It is reasonable to presume that common sense is prevailing now and even they want peace."

From the point of view of the Akali politics, however, the most significant clause is the acceptance of the demand for the promulgation of an All India Sikh Gurudwara Act in accordance with constitutional provisions and "in consultation with the Akali Dal". There was strong opposition to this within the Government. As a matter of fact in the aftermath of Operation Bluestar Mrs Gandhi's close advisors had blamed the Sikh Gurudwara Act, which gave the Akalis control of historic shrines in Punjab for all

LAND & WATERS DISPUTE

Pitfalls Ahead

OF ALL the issues bedevilling an accord on the Punjab problem, none has proved more intractable than that of the distribution of Ravi-Beas river waters between Punjab, Haryana and Rajasthan. And even the latest accord stops short of finding a solution to this problem. While the final allocation of waters has been left to a tribunal headed by a Supreme Court judge, even the clause maintaining the existing usage of water by the various states has caused confusion and is open to various interpretations.

The agreement set the seal on the present usage of water by the three states from the Ravi-Beas system as on July 1, 1985. Water for drinking purposes would also remain unaffected but the conflicting claims over the remaining waters would be worked out by a tribunal headed by a Supreme Court judge. The ruling would be delivered within six months and would be final and binding on all three states. The phrase "legal and binding" is a pointer to the conflicting claims and counter claims indulged in by politicians in the three states. Thus, Akali negotiator Balwant Singh and even Longowal have declared that any solution by the tribunal would favour Punjab since it was already drawing 4.8 million acre feet (MAF) of water. However, Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal is equally enthusiastic since it does not affect the 3.5 MAF they are presently drawing and "since our need is more than 7 MAF, we shall get more," he says confidently. As for the state of Rajasthan, the initial reaction of the Assembly was to unanimously reject the accord but Chief Minister Harideo Joshi rushed to Delhi and came back with the assurance that their share of 8 MAF would also remain unaffected.

Facts, however, have to be faced. The tribunal's award is bound to affect all three states to some extent or the other more so because the conflict runs deep. The Akalis have always taken the rigid stand that since Punjab is the sole riparian state, it alone has the right to the waters of the Ravi, Beas and Sutlej. They do concede to Haryana a share since it was once part of Punjab.

But the Centre maintains that since Rajasthan cannot get water from anywhere else, it has to get it from Punjab. As for Haryana, its canals are poorly developed and it gets little rain. Thus, when the first guidelines were issued for sharing river waters in 1955, Rajasthan was given 8 MAF, undivided PEPSU 7.2 MAF and Jammu & Kashmir 0.65 MAF.

Since then the Centre has always stuck to that formula while tilting slightly towards Punjab. The fruits of the 1960 Indus Waters Treaty with Pakistan—under which India got unrestricted rights to the use of those waters—were also divided between Punjab, Haryana and Rajasthan. Another agreement in 1976, more or less forced on the states by the Government during the Emergency, gave Punjab 3.5 MAF.

The Akalis protested and in 1981 a new agreement increased Punjab's share to 4.22 MAF. The Centre was quick to claim that this was a "fair and equitable" distribution but it cut no ice with the Akalis. Badal pointed out that 14.20 lakh hectares of land in the state were irrigated by canals, leaving over 20 lakh the trouble and there was talk of new, progressive legislation on the issue superseding the SGPC. But the Act proposed now will cover historic gurudwaras all over the country, which include the Sikh Takhts of Nanded and Patna and the three major gurudwaras in Delhi under the SGPC control. Since only the Sikhs vote in the SGPC election, the Akalis anticipate that they will continue to reign supreme. "With this the Akalis have been accepted as representatives not only of Punjab but of the whole lot of Sikhs in the country," complains Vajpayee. Within the Congress(I) also this was always opposed by people such as Buta Singh and Darbara Singh. But this time they just did not have a say in the matter.

The written, publicised clauses of the accord are, however, only part of the story. There is a widespread feeling—which Akali sources confirm—that there has also been a certain amount of unwritten understanding between the two parties. For example, at their mass contact programmes the Akalis claim that the Government has virtually decided to do away with the system of a population-based statewise quota system for recruitment in the army. They also claim that the Government has offered to ensure that the Union Public Service Commission will invariably have a Sikh member and as far as possible the state public service commissions will also include Sikhs. Government spokesmen, however, deny this, saying that the prime minister has conceded nothing except offering to write to all chief ministers to take special care of the interests of the minorities while making recruitments through the state public service commissions.

But more significant than all these is the widespread feeling that the accord involves an unwritten understanding between the Congress(I) and the Akalis to join hands politically and perhaps contest the next elections to the Punjab Assembly together. According to highly-placed sources within the Government this is based on the feeling that the price for lasting peace in Punjab is political power to the Akalis. This decision has also been apparently backed by the recently released religion-wise figures based on the 1981 census which places the percentage of Sikh population in Punjab at 65—a far cry from the 52 per cent it was believed to be all along. This has led to the view in official circles that in a future election Akali rule in Punjab is a fait accompli since, due to the polarisation of the past four years the Congress(I) has lost much of its old base among more educated sections of Sikhs. "Sant Longowal has now proved that he is a nationalist," said Amarjit Kaur, a Congress(I) Rajya Sabha member from Punjab, adding, "the climate is very good for elections in Punjab. And what is wrong if there can be an understanding with the Akalis?"

That indeed is a crucial question now. Logically, the next step after this agreement should be the poll in Punjab. A decision on this is likely to be taken soon. "Wait for eight to ten days," says Governor Arjun Singh, adding, "to avoid having to amend the Constitution again elections should be held before October 5," when the present spell of President's rule ends. He is apprehensive that there may yet be a terrorist backlash in the state, and dependent on diesel-run tubewells. He even quoted the Narmada Award of 1974 which denied water from the Narmada river to Rajasthan since it was not a riparian state.

Irrigation experts of Punjab and Haryana have gone on record to state that it is very difficult to measure the exact quantum of flow down the Ravi-Beas system on any single day since it is a continuous one. The usual practice, until now, has been to tabulate the total flow over a year divided by 365 days to get, with a reasonable degree of accuracy, the flow of a single day. Again, there is only a small canal taking about 1,200 cusecs of water from the Ravi with the rest of it flowing down to Pakistan. India has full claim to this water under the India-Pakistan Indus Water Treaty of 1960.

Obviously, until the Thein Dam comes up, all talk of utilising the remaining waters of the Ravi will remain notional. But there's more welcome news for Haryana. Construction work on the long-delayed Sutlej-Yamuna Link (SYL) canal, on which the state has spent Rs 100 crore over the last decade and written off Rs 700 crore in crop losses, will be speeded up and is expected to be completed by August 15 next year.

On the question of territorial disputes, for the first time the principle of contiguity and linguistic affinity with a village as a unit has been recognised. Punjab gets the Chandigarh capital project area that comprises nearly 70 per cent of the Union territory. The town of Mani Majra and the adjacent areas minus the Sukhna Lake—part of the Hindi region of composite Punjab—go to Haryana. A commission constituted with the help of linguistic experts will determine the remaining Hindi-speaking areas of Punjab, which will be transferred along with Chandigarh on Republic Day next year.

Other claims and counter claims for readjustment of the existing Punjab and Haryana boundaries will be gone into by another commission. Present indications are that some Punjab villages falling between Chandigarh and Haryana and a few other villages from Khanouri block of Patiala district adjoining Kurukshetra district will go to Haryana in lieu of Chandigarh. The award of Mrs Indira Gandhi in January 1970 had given Chandigarh to Punjab, with Haryana getting the prosperous tehsils of Abohar and Fazilka. Chief Minister Bhajan Lal has gone on record to state that he would respect the award of the commission, but it is pretty clear that his troubles are going to take off once it comes through. Large areas to which Haryana has been laying claim on the grounds that they are Hindi-speaking are now Punjabi-speaking. The last census saw many Hindus opt for Punjabi as their mother tongue instead of Hindi. As Haryana Lok Dal legislator Dr Bhim Singh Dahiya put it: "The linguistic basis goes against us unless the transfers are decided on the basis of the 1961 census."

The two blocks of Dehrabassi and Lalru of Patiala district, for instance, may choose to remain Punjabi. "We are all Punjabi and nobody will have the right to arbitrate over us," says Hukam Singh, a Hindu farmer from Bukhri village near Lalru. His opinion is echoed by other farmers and traders of the two blocks since they feel their interests are better protected in Punjab which has even had a farmer as chief minister. Says trader Ram Nath: "We are Punjabis and shall remain in Punjab, we also have better trade prospects." These sentiments are echoed by many other people in the affected areas.

But whichever way the decision on territories goes, it will ultimately affect people, unsettle families and even lead to a minor exodus. In fact that problem will be the most pronounced in Chandigarh where thousands of Haryana Government employees have already begun thinking in terms of shifting to a new capital which has not yet come into being.

is still undecided on whether to recommend an election in the last week of September, or let the state remain politically undisturbed for a longer period so that tensions raised by the agreement can cool off. In any case, his recommendations must reach Delhi in about two weeks. In the meantime, asked what he plans to do to beef up the state police and administration, he says: "I will do the bare minimum that is necessary. Let us leave that (major changes) to the popular government."

Akali circles are looking forward to the upcoming poll. While in the past Longowal used to react angrily at the very mention of the word election his reaction was very different now. "It really is a decision for the Election Commission to take. We will decide our stance once the decision is taken," he says. In Delhi too there were indications that the Government had sounded the Election Commission on the possibility of elections in Punjab in the very near future. This has also left the Opposition in a rage. A number of opposition leaders charge the Government with having made concessions on national interest for the sake of political gain in Punjab. They argue that while Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi damned them in the last Lok Sabha election for being on talking terms with the "anti-national" Akalis, his own party is now going to fight elections jointly with them.

The Congress(I) leaders deny the charge of an understanding with the Akalis but admit that the election is round the corner. But, just like the Akalis, they are conscious of the fact that the prospect of elections will prove to be a further provocation for the extremists to return to the streets. "Extremist activity is inevitable even if we take all precautions. But we will have to take it in our stride," says Arjun Singh. And already last week extremists made their presence felt in Amritsar by shooting Sub-Inspector Sadhu Singh who, as the station house officer of Verowal police station near Amritsar had been rather harsh on AISSF workers. Intelligence officers also sniffed out a new plan to eliminate Arjun Singh and Longowal, the two men most responsible for bringing about the accord. The Government nurses no illusions and admits the fact that the accord by itself will not rule out terrorism. But it will deny extremists the kind of covert support they earlier had from Akali politicians. Also, it is hoped that in the new mood the Sikh masses will be disinclined to provide help and sanctuaries to the terrorists.

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

Sohan Singh, a sewadar at Bhindranwale's gurudwara at Chowk Mehta speaks out against the accord: pockets of dissent

Even if it achieves that much, the settlement would have served its purpose and the Government would net a reasonable return for the price paid in terms of concessions. Yet there will be no getting away from some of the harsher lessons implicit in the developments of the past few weeks climaxing with the accord. For example, it will be said for a long time that the accord of July 24 is not substantially different from the drafts finalised in November 1982 and February 1984 which were initially agreed to by the Akalis but later scuttled by the Government itself with last minute changes. That also substantiates the Akali charge that during Mrs Gandhi's time the strong coterie of bureaucrats around her wielded exaggerated power and succeeded in throwing a spanner in the works. But the new Government had a different approach underlined in Balwant Singh's favourite line: "The difference between Mrs Gandhi and Rajiv is that while she trusted her bureaucrats he trusts himself." The lesson, however, is that indecision on such crucial issues extracts a price that the country can hardly afford to pay.

Also, the frenetic developments saw the Government and the prime minister himself having to eat their own words more than once. The same prime minister who had based a whole, vicious election campaign on the charge that the Opposition was backing the "secessionist and anti-national" Anandpur Sahib resolution has now signed an agreement that includes a promise to refer the resolution to the Sarkaria Commission. The justification is that the Akalis now affirm that the resolution is within the Constitution. "They haven't even bothered to specify which version of the resolution they are talking about. In any case the resolution talks about the glory of the Sikh nation," complains Vajpayee. The volte face can be defended with the argument that election rhetoric is one thing, serious negotiation quite another, but that would be a confession rather than an alibi. The lesson obviously is that it is dangerous to make political capital out of issues that are so intimately linked to national interest; any change will inevitably be regarded as a climbdown.

But no amount of recrimination can now alter the fact that the accord marks a new beginning for the beleaguered state of Punjab. There is a spirit of renewed hope and expectation in the state despite the widespread ravages of flash floods. And perhaps the most eloquent observation on the change comes from none else than Amrita Pritam, the queen of Punjabi poetry, who said: "A friend in Bulgaria has sent me a bunch of coloured threads. They tie these around the trees as soon as the spring comes and new leaves sprout. Today I wish I could tie these threads round the branches of our democracy. This accord really means the flowering of our democracy." Perhaps a new spring of peace and prosperity await Punjab after a long and cruel winter.

BHARATIYA JANATA PARTY

Revamping the Pantheon

IS THE Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) changing colour and adopting saffron again? Is it about to dump its assiduously sought secular image in favour of the fundamentalist posture of yore, and indeed go back to the identity of the Jan Sangh? The answers that emerged from the meeting of the party's national executive in Bhopal last month were indecisive, but there seems little doubt that at least one increasingly aggressive section of the party leadership would like to see a new political dawn for the party tinged with saffron. What else, they ask, can the party do when it has been humbled in the elections, lost the 'Hindu vote' to the Congress(I), and found its ambitions of developing into a far more secular, national alternative ground in the dust?

The key document that might have paved the way for this fundamental shift back to fundamentalism was the report of a working group set up to review the party's performance in the five years of its existence. But as things turned out, the Bhopal meet was not as decisive as it might have been. The report was ready only on the second day of the three-day meeting, and there was not enough time to debate it. Besides, the party leadership also decided to hasten slowly. The report will now be discussed at a camp of party workers in September before the leadership decides on its recommendations. Nevertheless, the report itself contained enough to fuel media speculation that the BJP had, as the Indian Express noted, decided to look "further back in a bid to move forward": a reference to the recommendation that the party jettison 'Gandhian socialism' as its political philosophy and replace it with 'integral humanism', a somewhat mystifying man-in-all-important creed evolved in the 1960s by party ideologue Deen Dayal Upadhyaya.

BJP leaders, however, were at pains to argue that the replacement did not mean the party was turning its back on Gandhi, whom they admitted into their pantheon only in 1980. Explaining the rationale for their recommendation, Krishanlal Sharma, convenor of the 12-member working group, said: "The Gandhian approach and socialism are not cohesive concepts. One stands for decentralisation and the other advocates statism. The concept was a legacy from our days in the Janata and we decided to have a more objective look at it." Murli Manohar Joshi, another member of the group, argued that the dissatisfaction with Gandhian socialism persisted because the leadership failed to convince the rank and file that it was no departure from integral humanism. "Workers continued to think that socialism meant statism while the leadership accepted socialism because of its concern for social justice."

There is little doubt that Gandhian socialism was never accepted even in the party's highest echelons. Said Vijaya Raje Scindia, the party's vice-president, who had opposed the creed when the party adopted it at its plenary session in Bombay in December 1980: "The concept was adopted in a hurry then and was sought to be imposed from the top levels of the party. I was personally never in its favour."

Media commentators have also interpreted the recommendation as a capitulation to a section in the party which wants to go back to the principles and policies of the Jan Sangh. Party President Atal Behari Vajpayee had himself posed this question when he suggested the setting up of the group at the last meeting of its executive. The group did not answer the poser directly but related the events leading to the formation of the party and concluded that the party had "taken the correct decision when it decided to merge Jan Sangh into the Janata Party, a wise decision when it decided to come out of the Janata Party and a right decision when it chose to be BJP".

In a way, the group's evasiveness reflects the continuing ambivalence on this issue within the party. Vajpayee heads the small group which mainly comprises non-Jan Sangh, non-RSS elements like Sikander Bakht, Rajya Sabha member Jaswant Singh, former law minister Shanti Bhushan and leading lawyer Ram Jethmalani, who believe there is no going back. Leading the hardliners is Scindia who feels the party has gained nothing by adopting principles and postures which differ little from other parties like the Congress(I) or Janata. Rooting for them from the sidelines is former Bharatiya Jan Sangh president Balraj Madhok who says derisively that the BJP has become a "B team" of the Congress(I). Many media commentators agree that the main crisis is one of identity, of the party being seen as no different from the Congress(I). As The Tribune noted: "It does not pay to be an imitation of the Congress(I) when the original is basking in the bright sunshine of an electoral landslide."

BJP plenum in 1980: winds of change

Vajpayee is very forthright and clear-headed on this issue. Unlike the hardliners who will not even admit that there are two streams of opinion within the party, Vajpayee does not hesitate to admit that "there is a section within the BJP which wants to make it a Hindu party because the Hindus have no party of their own." This section points to the way in which the Congress(I) fruitfully projected itself as a party for the Hindus in the last general elections and seeks to "thwart the Congress(I) in its attempt to become the party of Hindus." But Vajpayee, arguing differently, says there is no such thing as Hindu interests. "Hindus identify themselves with the national interest," he points out. He also believes that there is nothing like the Hindu vote and says: "The Hindu is liberal, secular and he wants a party whose doors will be open to all. Hindu society can never be fundamentalist."

According to him, the BJP faces no "identity crisis"; what it needs to resolve is "whether it wants to remain a small pressure group or become a national alternative. No sectarian party can do this (the latter) and those who fight elections know this." Jaswant Singh agrees: "BJP's current problems are the problems of growth, of evolving from a small, homogeneous pressure group to a heterogeneous, widely dispersed party. The BJP was in the process of growth when it received a check. Hence, the introspection."

And this introspection is likely to last for some time. Says K.R. Malkani, former editor of the Organiser: "The process of crystallising political lessons from electoral reverses is still on. The BJP has been at the crossroads since the elections and will be there for some more time." Pramod Mahajan, party secretary and member of the working group, feels it will be at least a year before the party acquires a new and clearer image.

Yet it is somewhat disingenuous to say that only the electoral losses have induced the introspection. The BJP has faced an identity problem ever since it split away from the Janata in April 1980. Even while doing well electorally—the party's high point was the April 1982 election in Himachal Pradesh when it almost pipped the Congress(I) to the electoral post—it realised that its image was its albatross.

A keynote paper, remarkable for its rhetoric and its optimism, circulated at a workers' camp in September 1981, had argued that if only the party showed faith and confidence in its newly-acquired secular and liberal image, it would truly emerge as a national alternative (INDIA TODAY, April 15, 1982). At one point the document argued: "Only our programme and policies can save the country; only our leaders are tested and trusted, only ours is a nation-wide party. We work up to only 25 per cent of our capacity." The paper had extrapolated that the party should win 243 seats in the next parliamentary elections (it won two of the 224 it contested). But as the INDIA TODAY report had pointed out, even then an intense debate raged in the party over its image: the progressives were dominant because the party was on an electoral upswing.

Some media observers were arguing last fortnight that the liberals in the BJP were now on the retreat. But they could not produce sufficient evidence to back their observation. Jaswant Singh, one of the liberals, maintained that he felt under no kind of pressure: "I have not felt inhibited. I continue to hold all the responsibilities I had."

Yet it is undeniable that the party is groping towards a new equilibrium in which some of the mannequins on its shop window would be changed: the report of the working group discussed at Bhopal last fortnight noted that the party was acquiring some "stay-puts". Vajpayee signalled that he was volunteering to be the first change when he announced at a press conference that he would not contest the presidential elections due in November. Significantly enough, Vajpayee announced the decision in response to a query on what steps the party proposed to take to bridge the "communication gap" between the leadership and the workers.

The party's ambitions have not been pruned: Vajpayee noted with satisfaction that the report had said the BJP should put up candidates for all 542 Lok Sabha seats in the next elections. And the attempt to give the party a clearer image has already begun. The Bhopal resolution that India should make a nuclear bomb, a stand which raised memories of the Jan Sangh's hawkish postures on defence, was the first step in repositioning itself as the party most concerned with the nation's security. Said Vajpayee: "We pre-empted Rajiv."

But as a member of the working group said, the party will not make the same mistake it did in 1980 of hastily accepting ill-defined policies and stands. Vajpayee himself was categorical that the issue of becoming a reincarnation of the Jan Sangh was closed for good. "Whether I remain the president or not, there is no going back," he told INDIA TODAY. But the debate will go in the party on all other issues. As Jaswant Singh said: "The mistake will be to conclude that the debate has concluded."

ASSASSINATION TRIAL

Courtroom Dramatics

Beyond, in the bare room of the (Red) Fort's military barracks the eight faced charges of murder and conspiracy to murder... the accused laughed and joked. Water-carriers wandered in to stare at the proceedings. And while legal briefs occupied the benches, banana skins strewed the floor....

Brian McConnel's Assassination

ALMOST four decades later, the setting for the trial in another Gandhi assassination was remarkably similar, even down to the mood of the accused. Instead of the Red Fort where Nathuram Godse and his co-conspirators were tried, it is a maximum security cell block in one corner of Delhi's Tihar jail that has been hastily converted into the makeshift stage for the trial of the three men accused of conspiring to assassinate the late prime minister Indira Gandhi last October. But apart from the bullet-proof glass cubicle that separates the three men, Satwant Singh, one of the two alleged assassins, his uncle Kehar Singh and Delhi police sub-inspector Balbir Singh, from the rest of the courtroom, the setting and historic significance is probably much the same as it was for the trial back in 1948.

The courtroom itself is bare and freshly whitewashed with barred windows shrouded for the first time in printed curtains. Access is through a Judas gate in one of the high, steel prison gates where all privileged to attend the trial—mainly journalists—are frisked physically and with metal detectors. Inside, armed personnel of the Tamil Nadu Special Police lounge around in the small courtyard and in the dank corridor leading to the rectangular courtroom. Despite the extra-precautionary security and the historic importance of the trial, however, there is a surprising lack of tension or expectancy in the air. The accused are brought in early from their nearby prison cell and wander around the courtroom, laughing and joking with the gaggle of rustic relatives who attend the sessions every day, or in whispered conversation with their defence counsels. At certain moments, the scene seems to resemble a rehearsal for a play.

Satwant, dressed in skin-tight jeans, sneakers and a synthetic sweat-shirt, appears the most unconcerned of the three. A wiry, well-proportioned man with a scraggle of beard framing his youthful, aquiline face, he looks more like a delinquent college student than the man who, even as over 300 of his security colleagues stood within shouting distance, allegedly gunned down in cold blood the woman he was sworn to protect. Neither is there the feral glint of the fanatic in his light-coloured eyes. There is instead, a quiet and deliberate defiance in his demeanour and the sudden smiles that he flashes frequently during the proceedings at his friends at the back of the courtroom. Unlike the other two accused, he is not afraid to look the curious reporters in the assembly in the eye. He walks with a limp, a legacy of the bullet still lodged in his spinal column, and excuses himself often to visit the bathroom opposite. Not that his presence is necessary. The proceedings are conducted in English, a language he is obviously unfamiliar with and he sits inside his glass cage, flanked by his co-accused, looking restless and bored.

An artist's impression of the special court

The other two, the stout bushy-bearded Balbir and Kehar, a meek-looking clerical type, seem more conscious of the seriousness of their position and the sanctity of the courtroom. They, like the rest of the assemblage, respectfully rise when the Additional Sessions Judge, Mahesh Chandra, a no-nonsense and erudite man, enters the court.

But even governed by a man of Chandra's obvious judicial capabilities, there was an eerie, Alice in Wonderland-like atmosphere in the court when the trial resumed earlier this month. Not so much because of the studied nonchalance of the accused or the casual attitude in the court with curious onlookers and security men wandering in and out which effectively belies what is supposed to be one of the most historic and sensational trials in decades. Neither is it the sight of the Senior Public Prosecutor, K.L. Arora, absently doodling on a legal pad throughout the proceedings.

The real reason is a short, bespectacled, balding man with a resonant voice and a mischievous glint in his eyes who has dominated the show, upstaging even Satwant Singh and Judge Mahesh Chandra. With his black coat and exaggerated gestures, P.N. Lekhi, Satwant's defence counsel, looks suspiciously like an out-of-work magician. The theatrical flourishes and the dramatic change in his vocal tone when making some telling remark only adds to the image. Even when extracting files from the two bulging canvas carrybags his aides bring, he makes it look like he is producing rabbits from a hat. Lekhi, if anything, is a consummate showman, turning towards the audience each time he makes a particularly dramatic point, and if the first few days of the trial are anything to go by, he is determined to squeeze every last drop from this case however enormously the odds are stacked against him.

Judging by his reputation, however, that was somewhat expected. Lekhi first hit the public eye during the Janata regime as government counsel in the headline-grabbing Shah Commission hearings in 1978. His judicial standing, however, has been largely coloured by the fact that he is a senior member of the Bharatiya Janata Party, in fact, its vice-president till just before the start of the Indira Gandhi assassination trial when he resigned after being refused permission by the party high command to represent Satwant Singh. It is obvious that Lekhi has staked his reputation on a case few lawyers were willing to accept because of its sensitive connotations. He also seems to have chosen the related strategy of dragging out the trial as long as possible and so far, he seems to have succeeded admirably in this intention. He is a scrappy, pugnacious legal bulldog and the bones he has so far been worrying at may belong to the wrong skeletons but they are skeletons all the same.

Last week, for instance, he tore gaping holes in the manner in which doctors at the All India Institute of Medical Sciences had left glaring discrepancies in the official records for the treatment and post-mortem on Mrs Gandhi. He established that many columns had been left blank leading to confusion about the time of death and whether or not, in fact, a post-mortem had actually been performed on Mrs Gandhi's body. The doctor who had done the actual post-mortem testified that Mrs Gandhi died at 2.23 p.m., whereupon Lekhi dramatically produced hospital records to show that Mrs Gandhi had been given nine pints of blood at 3 p.m. "I want to prove to the court that there was no post-mortem done on Mrs Gandhi. The report they have produced is a forged document. I have visited the institute and myself paced out and timed the activities of the doctors involved. What happened in the hospital was all a farce," he says.

The prosecution, in turn, accuses Lekhi of staging the farce and wasting the time of the court on irrelevancies. But Lekhi has the stage at the moment and he is determined to keep it. Often, he has the doctors under cross examination fumbling and hesitatingly evasive. But they are evidently reluctant to reveal that the stature of the woman contributed to the shoddy record-keeping and so the show goes on, with Lekhi contriving to use every trick at the disposal of his nimble fingers. Earlier, he electrified the soporific court by charging that the reason her skull was not opened during the post-mortem was to conceal the fact that she was drugged—and that too by members of her own family. What Lekhi was explicitly implying was that the conspiracy was hatched by members of Mrs Gandhi's own family. "Why," he thundered at one somewhat less than coherent point, "was Menaka Gandhi thrown out of the house lock, stock and barrel?" Making a juxtaposition that seemed mystifying, he went on: "Sonia Gandhi had received Indian citizenship only a few months before."

CREATIVE EYE

Defence counsel P.N. Lekhi: playing to the gallery

Whatever his reasoning, his outlandish and sometimes rather far-fetched theories have, however, succeeded in turning the case on its head. He has, for instance, also adopted the stubbornly-held line that there was a third assassin present who is being shielded as part of an allegedly elaborate cover-up and that none of Satwant's bullets hit Mrs Gandhi. (Satwant himself has claimed that there were bullets being fired from all directions but the investigators did not care to look beyond him and his alleged accomplice Beant Singh who was shot dead within minutes by commandos.) Lekhi is out to prove that some of the fatal bullets were fired from behind Mrs Gandhi, insinuating that there was a third assassin involved. In support, he produces voluminous medical encyclopaedias and diagrams to prove his point that certain bullets could not have taken the trajectory they did unless they were fired from somebody behind her. Lekhi's tenacious and aggressive arguments stem from the careful homework he does and doctors can only grudgingly admit that though his theories cannot be proved, they cannot be totally disproved either.

The elaborate and complex legal web that Lekhi is trying to spin has succeeded in throwing the prosecution on the defensive. Arora only occasionally interrupts his doodling to raise objections but they are usually overruled by Chandra who seems determined to play strictly by the judicial book. A sharp, intelligent man with over 100 murder cases behind him, Chandra is bent on allowing Lekhi to vent his steam. But conscious of the defence strategy of prolonging the case, he does his best to hurry it along, rephrasing complicated questions and eliminating others. "This court will not be influenced by any extraneous factors," he says, "I will make my decisions strictly on the merits of the case."

That final decision may be a long time in the making. So far, only a handful of the 188 witnesses have been called to testify and the case could well drag on for months which suits Lekhi admirably. He is well aware that the key witnesses like R.K. Dhawan, H.Y. Sharada Prasad and the other actual eye-witnesses to the assassination or its immediate aftermath are the prosecution's main weapons, and he is trying to score all the points he possibly can before putting them under his microscopic scrutiny. In that sense, the trial is only going through a warming up process. But like everything connected with her life, the trial connected with Mrs Gandhi's death promises to get hotter and more controversial as the wider dimensions of the courtroom drama unfold.

UTTAR PRADESH

The Householders

OLD HABITS die hard, as is amply demonstrated by former legislators and ministers in Uttar Pradesh. Deprived of yesterday's pomp and power, many of them now cling to the remnants of their past glory with amazing tenacity. Among these held-over loaves of office are the well-guarded, palatial houses that were given them when they were in power. It is this enduring love of theirs for reminders of the past that has forced the state Government to sit up and take note. Last fortnight, the authorities started legal proceedings against over a dozen former ministers, including two former chief ministers, and over 50 MLA's to evict them from the houses they have been unauthorisedly occupying. Admitted Chief Minister Narain Dutt Tiwari: "It is true that we have given a number of notices to irregular occupants who are both politicians and journalists but unfortunately they have not responded. The Government has now decided to launch legal cases against all of them."

The Government chose the soft line on the eviction of former ministers and MLA's from official residences because many of them are still powerful politicians and lobby leaders in the ruling party.

The Government's belated action against the recalcitrant politicians came when Tiwari's persuasive tactics failed to move them. The Government chose the soft line because many of them are still powerful politicians and lobby leaders in the ruling party. Among the former ministers who are not entitled to ministerial bungalows but have not vacated the houses allotted to them earlier are Balaram Singh Yadav, Brahm Dutt, former chief minister Sripat Misra, Nirmal Khatri, Yashpal Singh, Swami Prashad Singh and Satyendra Gudia. Though all of them have been allotted flats in New Delhi after their election to the Lok Sabha in December, they have yet to vacate their houses in Lucknow.

But they are only the latest in the long line of such politicians. In the state capital itself, there are at least a dozen Congress(I) leaders, like Union Minister for Health and Family Welfare Mohsina Kidwai, the Congress(I)'s Working President Kamalapati Tripathi, Lok Dal's Vice-President Hemvati Nandan Bahuguna and Union Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh, who have retained their official houses in Lucknow. Barring Singh, who is the first politician to pay market rent of Rs 900 a month for a government house none of them has even cleared his house rent arrears and some of them, like Kidwai and Tripathi, have had the houses in their possession for over a decade now. The Government's objections are not so much to the politicians who hold some elected posts even now, but to those who do not have any excuse for retaining the expensive six-room houses in the city's posh localities. Even former ministers like Ammar Rizvi, K.P. Tiwari, Ram Singh Khanna, Bachcha Pathak, Sri Krishan Goel, and Gulab Sehra, who were denied party tickets for both the Lok Sabha and the legislature, refuse to vacate their bungalows. Discloses an Estate Department official: "These politicians have created an awkward situation for us. Since we are reluctant to take action against them, we can't haul up any other illegal squatter on government land."

Entrance to Sukhda Mishra's one-room apartment: cramped

The ministers had to be put up in state guest-houses and private accommodation rented by public sector undertakings, while some had to make do with small, one-room apartments in an MLA's hostel.

Congressmen themselves have protested to the party high command over the housing episode. Says Salig Ram Shukla, a former state Congress(I) general secretary: "In the centenary year of the Congress, it is the duty of all of us to project a clean image. All former ministers, MLA's and MP's can contribute to this by vacating the houses and clearing their arrears. If they don't do it now, our image will badly suffer." Over a dozen Congress(I) MLA's have asked the chief minister to at least direct those ruling party leaders who own houses in Lucknow to vacate their official residences. The names of Rizvi and former chief minister Sripat Misra were specifically mentioned in this context. While Rizvi owns an old ancestral house in Kaisarbagh and is constructing a new one in Alganj, Misra's sons too have a palatial house in Lucknow's prestigious Dalibagh locality. But both Rizvi and Misra have retained the huge houses allotted to them during their tenure as minister and chief minister respectively.

Delay tactics by these unauthorised occupants have added to the Government's problems. It has so far failed to find suitable accommodation for 17 ministers of the present state Cabinet and over 200 of the 425 newly-elected MLA's. As the assembly's session began last fortnight, there were ugly scenes in the MLA's hostel where legislators from both the ruling party and the opposition groups fought with hostel officials, demanding accommodation. The ministers had to be put up in the state guest-houses and private accommodation rented by public sector undertakings. While Cooperation Minister Arun Kumar Singh spent over five months in a suite in the state guest-house, many others like Sibte Razi, Ajit Pratap Singh, Mrs Sukhda Mishra and Jai Ram Verma have had to make do with small, one-room apartments in one of the MLA's hostels.

While 20 of the 37 ministers in Tiwari's cabinet have been lucky enough to retain their ministerial residences due to their continuity in office, the remaining 17 had to write over a dozen times to the chief minister, who holds charge of the Estate Department, to provide them with accommodation. After two months of correspondence and reminders, 13 of them were finally given houses in May but when they sent their staff for taking possession, they found the houses still occupied by the previous allottees. Similarly, of the 212 MLA's who were given accommodation, only about 150 could take possession of the flats allotted to them. The harried Estate Department officials have thrown up their hands in despair. With only 553 houses available for allotment to MLA's and MLC's they have been unable to provide a residence to each one of them, because over half of the houses are already illegally occupied. It is a measure of sorts that there were only 20 such cases in 1967, while the present figure stands at a shocking 200. Says a senior officer of the department: "In four out of 10 cases, the MLA's and MLC's refuse to move out after their defeat. I think the Government must evolve a scheme under which they are entitled to retain houses and get pension also." The whole unsavoury episode can only be taken as a sign of the times since never before has the state politician's credibility plunged so low.

TAMIL NADU

Curious Case

MADRAS Police Commissioner S. Sripal finds himself in the unenviable position of being damned if he does and damned if he does not. On the one hand he is obliged to arrest A.M. Paulraj, editor of the trade weekly Vaniga Ottrumai on the basis of an arrest warrant issued by state Assembly Speaker P.H. Pandian for breach of the Assembly's privilege. On the other, the first bench of the Madras High Court specifically ordered that Paulraj should not be arrested pending the disposal of his appeal against the dismissal of his earlier petition challenging the arrest warrant.

With contrary directions emanating from the judiciary and the legislature, Sripal found himself the helpless victim of a curious constitutional crisis in the state. If he arrests Paulraj he could be hauled up for contempt of court. If he does not he could be cited for the same offence as Paulraj—breach of the Assembly's privilege. The police commissioner was tight-lipped about what he planned to do, but it was apparent that this was one instance when no action was the best action. Paulraj was in hiding, and the police could say they were unable to trace him.

Paulraj's dilemma perhaps best symbolised the growing legislative storm in the state that has been brewing for some time and has now predictably set the state legislature and the judiciary on a confrontation course. It all began with an editorial by Paulraj in the February 1983 issue of his weekly in which he wrote: "Recently our chief minister announced that the incidence of rowdyism in the state has been drastically reduced. Only now we realise that all the rowdies in the state have contested elections, become honourable MLA's and entered the legislature. Naturally rowdyism on the streets has decreased... The dignity, honour, decorum and discipline so native to the state of Tamil Nadu have been scattered to the winds by the antics of rowdies, goondas and loafers who had gained entry to the legislature as MLA's."

Strong words, and they brought the wrath of the MLA's down on Paulraj's head. The privileges committee of the then assembly recommended one week's imprisonment for him, but the recommendation was not acted upon. However the next—eighth—assembly took up the matter again and sentenced Paulraj to two weeks imprisonment, and initially the legislators received a measure of satisfaction. Judge S. Mohan of the high court refused to admit Paulraj's petition on the ground that the legislature was a continuing body, and therefore the editor's contention that it was not in order for the eighth Assembly to act on the recommendations of the privileges committee of the seventh was not applicable. The judge also cited Article 212 of the Constitution which lays down that "the validity of any proceedings in the legislature shall not be called in question on the ground of any alleged irregularity of procedure."

Only a day before the judgement Pandian had crowed: "The House is supreme. Nobody, no power on earth can interfere with us." But a closer look at Mohan's judgement revealed that it was not as great a victory for the legislators as it was made out to be. The judge had not conceded blanket immunity to the legislature. He had not laid down that nothing happening in a legislature could be called into question in a court. But what was most responsible for raising the legislators hackles was an obiter dicta Mohan tacked on to his judgement in which he quoted former President Sarvapalli Radhakrishnan as saying: "Our representatives who will speak on behalf of our nation should be cultured, disinterested and public-sprited persons and not those who are lost in petty personal, local, caste and communal squabbles and succumb to the seduction of power." After the quotation the judge posed a relevant question: "Is it too much of an expectation or too high a demand? Let history answer."

"His lordship should not have said that. I shall deal with this on behalf of the House," threatened Pandian. He was clearly brandishing his sword of legislative privilege. And as if he was replying to the judge's quotation from Radhakrishnan, he came up with a quote from the late US president Franklin Delano Roosevelt: "We have therefore reached the point as a nation where we must take action to save the constitution from the court and the court from itself. We want a supreme court which will do justice under the Constitution, not over it. In our courts we want a government of laws and not of men."

Paulraj's defence before the first bench of the high court was the same as before Mohan: that the eighth Assembly could not work on the recommendations of the privileges committee of the seventh. And this time the bench stayed his arrest. But in a consequent statement the speaker said the Assembly's arrest warrant was still "operative". He went a step farther by reiterating categorically that "no officer of the House, or members of the legislature in whom powers are vested for regulating the procedure or conduct of business shall be subject to the jurisdiction of any court in the exercise of their powers and performance of their functions authorised under the Constitution and the House."

The irony of the situation is that the sensitivity of the legislature in Tamil Nadu to breaches of its privilege is in direct proportion to growing attacks from people like Paulraj and satirist Cho Ramaswamy against what they feel is its abuse of that privilege within the House. Ramaswamy, the redoubtable editor of the popular Tamil fortnightly, Tughlaq, has launched what leader of the House and Finance Minister V.R. Nedunchezhiyan termed "repeated assaults on the dignity of the House" while referring to a privilege motion against him to the Committee.

"The House is supreme. Nobody, no power on earth, can interfere with us."

P.H. PANDIAN
Tamil Nadu assembly speaker

Though Ramaswamy does have a reputation for taking up cudgels on behalf of all manner of causes, Paulraj does not fit the image of a crusading journalist. The 42-year-old editor belongs to the Christian Nadar community, and his journal—the circulation of which has never exceeded 10,000—had been conceived as a mouthpiece for the Christian Nadar business community that would help it wrest concessions from the Government. The editorials would lambast the Government if promised concessions to the community did not materialise. It was apparently during one of those depressed moods of the community that Paulraj picked on the legislative Assembly. A lower-middle class man who lives in a dingy slum in west Madras, Paulraj is a devout Congress(I) loyalist who wears only khadi and according to his wife "wept uncontrollably when he heard the news of Mrs Gandhi's death."

Ramaswamy and Paulraj seem to have reason enough for their persistent broadsides if the record of the Tamil Nadu assembly proceedings is anything to go by. Once, when he was deputy speaker, Pandian had actually challenged DMK member Rahman Khan to a physical duel. He has been guilty of uttering unprintable epithets quite often, and gained notoriety in the earlier assembly for expunging his own remarks on quite a few occasions when he was in the chair. The general standard of debate in the House can be gauged from the fact that when Nedunchezhiyan proposed the two weeks imprisonment for Paulraj and Rahman Khan of the DMK brought an amendment to reduce the sentence to one week, every bit of the 45-minute-long proceedings had to be expunged. On the day Pandian asserted the supremacy of the House while referring to Paulraj's petition before the high court he had to expunge 15 minutes of unsavoury mudslinging between no less a person than Local Administration Minister P.U. Shanmugham and the ever ready Rahman Khan. But Pandian, now serving his third term in the Tamil Nadu Assembly is the most notorious of the MLA's for pugnaciousness.

If the whole issue of the judiciary versus the legislature comes to a boil it is difficult to predict the possibilities. The Supreme Court has ruled that the legislature and the judiciary are both supreme in their respective spheres. The unanswered question is: who is more supreme when their spheres overlap? Cho Ramaswamy says: "Courts are entitled to see what the privileges of a House are. They can go into whether a particular thing is a privilege or not. But whatever it is the right of obscenity is not one of the privileges of even this House with all its aptitude for it. People are entitled to know how their representatives behave inside the House." Over to Pandian.

The power of youth reinforced AMCO

Today's youth. Vibrant. Dynamic. Always on the go. On his new generation vehicles.

To keep this tempo up, a 30-year young battery manufacturer has joined the race : AMCO.

It has just signed a technical collaboration with Yuasa Battery Co. of Japan, the world's largest manufacturer of motorcycle batteries, and a leader in a variety of automotive and industrial batteries – to bring to you the most advanced batteries of our times.

AMCO's progress drive

As a leading manufacturer of automotive, locomotive and industrial batteries, AMCO has always been in the forefront of technology.

The Yuasa tie-up is another step forward for AMCO in the 'progress' direction. To produce the new generation batteries for the new breed of two-wheelers, four-wheelers and other equipment. As well as to modernise its facilities for this new class of products and technology.

AMCO is also strengthening its 600-strong dealer network and service outlets for its new batteries that will be swamping the market.

Yes, when it comes to batteries, trust AMCO. Forever ready – to meet tomorrow's challenges today.

Hoardings on a busy thoroughfare: traffic hazards

TAMIL NADU

Board Ban

IT WAS an ironic step for a state which has been ruled for the past eight years by a former matinee idol. Last fortnight the Tamil Nadu Government successfully pushed through a Bill in the state Assembly empowering it to take over all cinema hoardings in the state as well as those being used for political or commercial purposes. Piloted by Local Administration Minister P.U. Shanmugam, the novel and sweeping Bill went to the extent of banning the erection of any hoardings by private parties in Madras city with immediate effect, and would cover the entire state as soon as the President gave his assent to the Bill and it became an Act.

The reasons for the rather drastic move had been staring the citizens of Madras in the face. Seductive, if not downright obscene and vulgar hoardings had been mushrooming throughout the state, especially in Madras city. Scantily-clad heroines loomed over the traffic at busy intersections, and were assuming, if they had not already, all the dimensions of a serious traffic hazard. For example, bus drivers and motorists hurtling down the steep Gemini fly-over in Madras were distracted by the sight of a larger-than-life bikini-clad belle, with unfavourable consequences for traffic safety and human life.

The statement of objects and reasons for the Bill noted that "there has been a haphazard growth of hoardings in the state leading to traffic hazards and numerous accidents. Certain persons are unduly enriching themselves by erecting hoardings indiscriminately and exhibiting indecent and obscene advertisements on such hoardings." The Government was not off the mark in averring that obscene hoardings were being put up deliberately by private interests. A gigantic hoarding on a busy thoroughfare showing a half-naked woman suckling a baby was certainly not put up with the intention of plugging mother's milk. And an equally huge frame of a village belle bathing while a goat brought her brassiere had not been visualised to bring the delights of village life to city dwellers or promote the sale of undergarments.

The obscene hoarding menace had reached such a state in the city that even the generally low-key women's rights activists of Madras felt compelled to protest. A 50-strong procession of women marched down busy Mount Road on two occasions and pulled down what they considered obscene posters. Remarked Kalavathy Iyer, one of the marchers: "Our demonstrations were successful. Obscenity in the hoardings was beginning to know no limits, so we welcome the Government move to curb the menace."

The traffic police concur that the hoardings are a major traffic hazard. Said a senior police official: "We have not conducted any survey about accidents in the vicinity of hoardings. But it is the definite view of policemen enforcing the traffic rules that distracting hoardings on busy thoroughfares and traffic junctions greatly increase the chance of accidents."

But the moot question is whether the new piece of legislation will curb the obscene hoarding menace and prevent distracting hoardings from coming up at traffic junctions. The Bill, for instance, does not explicitly ban hoardings at traffic junctions. All that it does is enable the Government to take over all private hoardings—in other words all hoardings will henceforth be put up by the government agencies instead of private parties. The Bill also exempts any hoardings which carry advertisements about the trade or business being carried on at the site of the hoarding. Film hoardings in front of theatres can continue to inveigle and entice the drivers of passing vehicles with impunity.

Perhaps the only tangible effect of the Government measure will be to drive out of business the 50 or so large hoarding contractors in the state. Madras city itself has nearly 25 large, medium and small companies which lease hoarding sites from the Madras district collector and erect hoardings for their clients. The Government contends that the hoarding companies and contractors indulge in profiteering. In fact the Madras collectorate raised the rents for hoarding sites four years ago and said it would not renew the leases. But many of the contractors went to the high court challenging the collectorate's action.

The high court's final judgement is expected soon, but it will not make any difference to what is going to happen; the hoarding companies will lose their hoardings. But they at least will be compensated. What is causing greater anxiety is the prospect of unemployment for the 5,000-odd casual and contract labourers in the state engaged in erecting and painting hoardings. A typical case is that of 32-year-old S. Perumal, who supports a family of eight by erecting scaffolding for hoardings and earns over Rs 1,000 a month. Perumal has been in the business for 13 years, and says: "I have studied up to class five. But somehow with God's blessings I have been able to earn my livelihood in this trade. If the Government takes over the hoarding business altogether I don't know if I can continue to find work. I am worried about how I will feed my family."

The hoarding contractors are willing to compromise. Says Kishan Shah, president of the Tamil Nadu Outdoor Advertisers Association and a partner of one of the oldest hoarding companies in the state: "We are willing to negotiate with the Government. We are prepared to pay higher rents and will remove obscene hoardings. If the police show us hoardings that are traffic hazards we will remove them also." Sunder Swamy, a partner of Swamy Advertising, refutes the Government contention that the hoarding companies indulge in profiteering. Says he: "The hoarding companies make very modest profits. By the most liberal estimate the turnover in Madras city will not be more than Rs 2.5 crore, and outdoor advertising in Madras is the cheapest in India. So where is the necessity for this bill in Madras?"

The wide sweep of the bill also perplexes many. Says Geeta Rameshan, a lawyer: "If it was obscenity in hoardings that the Government wanted to tackle this bill wasn't necessary at all. The existing provisions in the Indian Penal Code are enough to proceed against obscene hoardings." Adds R.Vasudevan, chief executive of an outdoor advertising company: "What the Government should do is regulate the hoarding business, not take it over completely. Where is individual freedom if the state Government can take over a communications medium like this?" But with the state Government seemingly determined to go ahead with its plans, the city of Madras will somehow never look the same again.

RAJASTHAN

Murder Charge

RAJASTHAN's best publicised criminal case took a major step forward last fortnight with the filing of a charge-sheet in court by the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI). The CBI charged 16 policemen—including Deputy Superintendent of Police Kan Singh Bhati and Station House Officer Veerendra Singh—with February's murder of independent legislator Man Singh of Deeg in Bharatpur district. Two other policemen were accused of forgery and preparation of false reports.

The charge-sheet was the culmination of a massive exercise undertaken by the CBI in which nearly 500 people were questioned, including Adarsh Kishore Saxena, secretary to the former chief minister Shiv Charan Mathur, who resigned on February 23, 1985, in the wake of the incident. The CBI has also filed a list of 199 witnesses and 206 documents in the court of Giriraj Prasad Sharma, special judicial magistrate for CBI cases in Jaipur.

On February 20, Man Singh had rammed his vehicle, a remodelled weapons carrier, into a ruling party podium and then the helicopter that had brought Mathur to Deeg. According to the charge-sheet, Bhati was all set to leave for Jaipur in connection with these cases the next day, when he got calls from his superiors in Jaipur and Bharatpur.

The charge-sheet states that soon after, Bhati got together a posse of about two dozen policemen and went towards the market-place, with himself and Veerendra Singh in the lead. The tail was brought up by Bhati's jeep, whose driver was instructed to block the escape route.

When Man Singh, in his jeep full of supporters, approached them Bhati raised his hand to ask him to stop. Man Singh responded with a similar gesture and the carrier rolled forward and came up just short of Bhati's jeep. The market-place was crowded and Man Singh turned around to look before putting his carrier in reverse.

At that point, a constable, under Bhati's instructions, shot at and drove his bayonet into the vehicle's rear tyre. By now the police had ringed the legislator and his supporters from three sides, the front being blocked by the jeep. According to the charge-sheet, Bhati fired his revolver and also ordered his men to open fire. At least 10 shots were fired: Man Singh was hit in the head, chest and arm and his two supporters, Sumer Singh and Hari Singh, were also killed.

The CBI has not been able to explain Bhati's belligerence but it has found several holes in the initial police explanations. Contrary to what the police said, at no stage did Man Singh try to escape from the police nor did he ram his weapons carrier into the police jeep or open fire at them. The police allegation that

The spot where Man Singh was killed

Man Singh and his supporters were armed and had created a law and order problem in the market was patently false because Man Singh and his group were unarmed. Also, after smashing the podium and the helicopter, Man Singh had made no attempt to hide.

There was other evidence of continuing discord between the CBI and the state Government. The CBI had sought permission to charge 18 policemen with murder but the Government gave its sanction, belatedly, to prosecute only 13. But the CBI took advantage of a loophole in the sanction order to prosecute three more policemen. The standard format of the sanction order ends with a clause which permits prosecution for "(and) any other offence punishable under the law in connection with this case". The CBI capitalised on this opening. Whether the judge finds the allegation of murder against all of them valid, will be decided when the charges are framed by the court.

MANIPUR

The Siege Within

MANIPUR Chief Minister Rishang Keishing's official residence at Imphal resembles a small fortress with squat watch-towers, guards patrolling the perimeter and rifle snouts poking from behind sandbags. The precautions are meant to keep off Naga insurgents, but last fortnight Keishing was under siege from a somewhat more familiar set of adversaries: dissidents in the Congress(I). At fortnight's end Keishing was still the chief minister but the attacks had not ceased and odds on him becoming the seventh Congress(I) chief minister to be changed in the nine months since Rajiv Gandhi came to office were embarrassingly low.

Though Keishing was still ahead in the numbers game—22 of the party's 35 MLA's in a house of 60 were behind him—the uncertainty persisted because he had antagonised powerful elements within and outside the party. A powerful faction of the Congress(I) headed by PCC(I) chief Lalit Singh and including two ministers was in open revolt. More important, he had antagonised Governor K.V. Krishna Rao by openly accusing him of refusing to swear in six MLA's as ministers in defiance of his 'advice'.

Dissidence has been endemic ever since Keishing took charge in 1981 but the current crisis began in late June when Lalit Singh, who was also finance minister, Education Minister Tompok Singh, and Agriculture Minister Soso Lorho, collectively known as the "big three", staged a revolt. Together with nine other MLA's they took a memorandum critical of Keishing to Rajiv Gandhi. The note listed his alleged acts of corruption, anti-party and anti-national activities and demanded his ouster.

Lalit Singh then followed up by suspending Keishing's close political adviser and PCC(I) general secretary, Laokhapao Kom, early last month. Next, on July 14 he suspended local self-government minister Radha Binode Koijam from the party for superseding the Imphal municipality against the party's directives to that effect.

It can hardly be a coincidence that the same day Keishing decided it was time he inducted six more ministers into his 13-member ministry. But if he had hoped to strengthen his position with that, he hadn't reckoned with Governor Rao who clearly had very different ideas of what his role was. Instead of taking decisions on his own, Rao soon began to function like a conduit to Delhi. His first advice to Keishing was specific: to refrain from making any percipitate announcement. Rao seemed aware of the high command's reported instructions to the chief minister not to do anything till the prime minister, who was in Madras, returned to New Delhi on July 16.

Keishing

Keishing's future is uncertain because he was under attack from dissidents and had antagonised Governor Krishna Rao.

Krishna Rao

Disregarding Rao, Keishing sent in a list of the names of ministers he wanted along with a request that they be sworn in the next day, July 15. At this point Rao's role becomes somewhat difficult to understand. When Keishing asked about the swearing-in, Raj Bhawan said he would be informed as soon as New Delhi sent further instructions. Matters became still more curious the next day when Keishing sent in a fresh list, amending the earlier one. Convinced that the chief minister had not cleared the list from New Delhi, Rao sat tight.

The denouement was predictable: as Keishing recalled, the next day PWD officials put up a shamiana at the Raj Bhawan, the publicity department made all arrangements for covering the occasion and the Manipur Rifles' band actually marched to the Raj Bhawan while the MLA's waited in Keishing's house in vain. Keishing accused Rao of disregarding his advice but sources close to the governor pointed out that the governor had not categorically refused to swear in the MLA's. Rao had merely informed Keishing that "the precise date of the swearing-in would be made known".

Though the chief minister insists that as long as he is the leader of the party's legislative wing, the governor is bound to act according to his advice, even on the date of the swearing-in, the Indian Constitution is maddeningly ambiguous on this point. For, according to Article 163 Section 2 of the Constitution, "If any question arises whether any matter is or is not a matter as respects which the governor is by or under this Constitution required to act in his discretion, the decision of the governor in his discretion shall be final, and the validity of anything done by the governor shall not be called in question on the ground that he ought or ought not to have acted in his discretion." But Keishing was categorical that the implications of Rao's decision were ominous. As he told INDIA TODAY: "The governor's action has set a precedent and will have repercussions in all other states."

The Keishing Rao-confrontation, which recalled other controversial acts by governors in the recent past such as in Sikkim, when Nar Bahadur Bhandari was dismissed, and Jammu and Kashmir when Farooq Abdullah was toppled, rang alarm bells in Delhi. A fire-fighting operation on predictable lines was launched. The party's General Secretary in charge of Manipur, A.K. Antony, flew to Imphal the same day. Antony was later joined by Rajesh Pilot, MP, and when the two returned a good five days later, a tenuous peace had been established: Lalit Singh had withdrawn his suspension notice on Koijam and Keishing had withdrawn his expansion proposal. But Keishing continued to maintain that he had the party high command's approval for expanding his ministry. "I had expressed my desire to expand my ministry before the state budget session opening on June 11 but I was advised to carry out the expansion after the budget session and this is what I tried to do."

Keishing, who had met Rajiv early last month, added: "The prime minister had asked me why I could not handle the dissidents. I told him that I had accommodated the three dissident leaders in my cabinet despite knowing that they are my rivals. So what more could I do?"

The dissidents are known to feel that Keishing, being a member of the minority Naga community (he is a Tangkhul Naga), does not have the interests of the majority Meitei community at heart. Leaders like Tompok Singh, who had been Keishing's close confidant till recently, also say that Keishing had increasingly come to rely on his relatives and "purchaseable" MLA's. "The chief minister's son, Namputin, had become so used to having ministers do as he wanted that last year he once threatened me with a revolver for holding up the file," Tompok alleges.

Tompok, Lalit Singh and other disgruntled elements are not yet ready to throw in the towel. INDIA TODAY learns that they are currently preparing a list of detailed charges against the chief minister to continue their campaign. Nor are they relaxing the overt pressure on him: Lalit Singh flew to Delhi to make the dramatic accusation that Keishing's brother's business associate had threatened to wipe out Singh's entire family.

The titans continue to confront each other. Says Tompok Singh: "Keishing has lost the moral right to continue as chief minister since he has lost the confidence of the high command and the governor." In return, Keishing boasts: "I even command the loyalty of half the opposition members in the 60-member house." But there is an edge of anxiety in his boast and there are reports, which he has still to deny, that he had personally visited opposition MLA's. Either way, Keishing is in an unenviable position.

TELUGU GANGA PROJECT

Troubled Waters

MOST inter-state rows over sharing river waters rise and fall like the level of the river, but the raging conflict between Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh last fortnight was on the question of sharing the water flowing down the 1,440-km-long Krishna at the turn of the century. Karnataka Congress(I) leader Veerappa Moily stoked the controversy when he charged the Ramakrishna Hegde Government with neglecting the state's interests. Moily argued that the Rs 688-crore Telugu Ganga Project (TGP) of Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao would irrigate over two lakh hectares of land in Andhra with water meant for Karnataka. He alleged that the project, scheduled to be ready in 1989, would draw water over and above the quota Andhra was entitled to and since neither Karnataka nor Maharashtra was utilising its allotted share, Andhra would press its claim for greater allocation when the review of the Krishna waters agreement came up in 2000. Charged Moily: "Hegde is jeopardising the state's interests to retain rapport with NTR."

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

Work on the project in Cuddapah (above) and (below) NTR and Hegde

Karnataka Public Works Minister H.D. Deve Gowda promptly denied the charge and termed NTR's plans as "distortions" of the 1976 accord on the sharing of waters. To that NTR responded with the statement pointing out that Andhra Pradesh had satisfied all doubts before initiating work on the project and that Hegde knew of Andhra Pradesh's increased need. "We are not begging or asking for favours but proceeding with the project in accordance with our rights," he declared. Hegde backtracked by acknowledging NTR's clarification but added that he had reservations on the project which he had told the Centre about. The war of words ended when Gowda told the council that the concerned states should meet, discuss and finalise once and for all as to how the surplus of 333 TMC feet should be shared. If a solution could not be found, he added, a Krishna Valley Authority should be created to apportion the water.

The problem arose because of different interpretations to the 1976 Bachawat panel award on the sharing of the Krishna waters. The panel permitted Andhra Pradesh, which had a large number of irrigation projects on stream, to tap the surplus flow of the Krishna but not claim the additional water as a right. NTR however claims that the panel had given Andhra the right to use the surplus water. Karnataka feels Andhra would not have gone in for the Rs 688-crore TGP unless NTR had his eyes on getting hold of more water.

The dispute also lingers because nobody really knows the extent of the surplus. Gowda's estimate may just be a rough guess. Also, it is not known how much the TGP will take: will 27.5 TMC feet be enough or will it take more since the canal has been widened? NTR's Government is not telling.

There was mystery also about Moily's reasons for raking up the issue. That Hegde and Gowda have differences is well known and observers feel Moily's charge was calculated to widen this wedge. The assessment gained some credibility when G. Havanur, Congress(I) MLA, declared in the Assembly: "We will wholeheartedly support Gowda against Hegde." The Congress(I)'s likely game plan had only half succeeded; it did not create a crisis in the Janata Government but it did cloud Hegde's friendly relations with NTR.

"For 20 years we had been saving for Mini's wedding . . . almost from the day she was born. Skimping even on bare necessities. Adding bit by bit . . . a saree now, a little piece of jewellery then, a bed cover sometimes. Slowly, painfully we had built up a wedding our only daughter deserved. It would have all been worthwhile when next week she took it all to her new home, new life. But before she could, the burglars did."

A burglary, sometimes, feels like not just the loss of things, but the loss of a dream, a hope, a future, a new life. Sometimes, almost like a death in the family. Suddenly, the things you had grown used to, the things you valued and felt proud to possess, are not there anymore. Their absence is a painful reminder day after day, hour after hour, moment after moment...a wound being chafed again and again before it can heal. You may not always be able to prevent a burglary. But you can certainly take cover against it. The right cover. The Oriental cover.

CRIME

In Cold Blood

HE WAS one of the rising stars of the ruling party. Young, personable and a go-getter, Lalit Maken, 35, Congress(I) MP from south Delhi, was obviously a man with a bright future, popular with his constituents and his political colleagues. But last week, he paid the price of that popularity—in his own blood. In a senseless, unforgivable act, two unidentified assailants sprayed him with a burst from a Sten gun when he was leaving his house in a busy industrial area to attend Parliament on July 31. Bleeding profusely, Maken staggered towards his house but the killers followed him and fired another burst, killing Maken. His wife, Gitanjali daughter of Andhra Pradesh Governor, S. D. Sharma and a party worker who were injured in the firing, succumbed in hospital a short while later.

Maken's driver was also injured by the assailants who managed to escape on the two-wheeled scooter they had arrived on. Neighbours rushed out of their houses on hearing the shots but were unable to stop or properly identify the killers except for the fact that they were clean shaven and in their early 20s. In Parliament, news of the tragedy was received with shocked incredulity. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and Home Minister S.B. Chavan rushed to the hospital where the bodies had been taken. Heavy police contingents fanned out into sensitive areas in the city to prevent expected violence. Maken was a powerful and popular trade union leader and his sudden and brutal death sent tremors of tension throughout the city. "He was the type of MP we are trying to encourage," Rajiv stated in Parliament, "he will be remembered for his fight for workers and his outspokenness." In a rare and unusual gesture, both Houses adjourned for the day. Usually, only the House to which the member belongs adjourns as a mark of respect.

Delhi police chief Ved Marwah quickly announced a Rs 1 lakh reward for information leading to the capture of the killers but till the time of writing, there were very little clues as to the identity of the assailants. The only possibility being discussed was that his trade union activities had some connection with his murder. Maken first came into prominence as a union activist who joined the Sanjay brigade but he fell out with the group after a short stint and joined the Congress(S). He returned to the Congress(I) fold in 1982 and was nominated member of the Delhi Metropolitan Council.

But his real forte was trade unionism and within a remarkably short while he was being referred to as "Delhi's Datta Samant". In the short span of two years, Maken had succeeded in wresting control of the two prominent unions in Delhi. The Delhi Electric Supply Undertaking (DESU) and the Delhi Transport Corporation (DTC) from, ironically enough, another rival faction of the local Congress(I). He had also taken up the cause of the Delhi textile workers. His election as president of the DTC union was contested in the High Court by his chief rival, Laxmi Narain, also a Congress(I) MP. The court, however, upheld Maken's election. Maken operated independently of the Indian National Trade Union Congress-I (INTUC) and in the last two years, concentrated on winning over the key core of Central Government employees to his fold. In that, he seemed to have succeeded admirably and at the time of his tragic death was president of the National Confederation of Central Government Employees and Workers. He was elected to the Lok Sabha with a thumping majority during the last elections earlier this year.

His union activities, however, were not without controversies. The DTC strike he orchestrated in 1984 ended in violence. But his growing influence and popularity obviously created rivals and even within the Congress(I), there were powerful senior leaders who showed their open jealousy and dislike. But within trade union circles, there was little credence given to the theory that Maken's death was the result of trade union rivalry. Maken had built his reputation on his genuine commitment to the workers and even his rivals grudgingly admit that he put in tremendous effort and time into not just his union activities, but into his south Delhi constituency as well. Basudeb Acharya, CPM MP and fellow trade unionist said; "He will be remembered for his valiant struggle for the downtrodden." Added veteran parliamentarian and CPI leader Indrajit Gupta: "When journalists asked me at the last session who was the most impressive newcomer, Maken was the first name that came to my mind." On the day after his tragic demise, Maken was scheduled to speak at a government employees' rally at the Boat Club in Delhi to press for a constitutional amendment to restore the right of the employee to be heard before the issue of an order of dismissal.

However, the mystery surrounding Maken's death is not likely to be resolved soon. Delhi police sealed off all the borders and exit points within a few hours. But the theory doing the rounds was that Maken could have been the random victim of extremists. Maken had apparently received a threatening letter a few days earlier in which the writer had stated that two men trained in Pakistan were after his life. Furthermore, trade union rivals would not normally have access to a Sten gun and neither is it likely that a union rival would take recourse to such an extreme step specially involving a person as prominent and popular as Maken. Intelligence sources say Maken was on the Punjab extremists' hit list after the November riots but ironically, his police guard was removed on July 25, the day after the Punjab accord was signed. Whatever the final truth, the act is as senseless as it is brutal. Maken, who leaves behind a seven-year-old daughter (his only brother died in an accident in 1973), was an inspiration, not just to the thousands of workers whose rights he fought for so valiantly, but for virtually everybody who knew him and respected his dynamism and commitment. Tragically, those very attributes appear to have marked him out as a target for assassination.

1980 heralded a new chapter in the power industry. S&S introduced for the first time in India, Vacuum Circuit Breakers, in collaboration with Brush Switchgear Ltd of the United Kingdom – a member of the Hawker Siddeley Group of Companies.

S&S Vacuum Circuit Breakers were welcomed by the Power Industry, as they require hardly any maintenance. And, are very effective protection for expensive equipment and Power Distribution Systems.

S&S now manufacture a wide range of Indoor and Outdoor Vacuum Circuit Breakers. From 3.3 kV to 36 kV, for various applications. Such as Power Station Auxiliaries, Transformer Protection, Capacitor Bank Switching, Urban and Rural Feeder Lines, Furnace and Motor Control Operations for Steel, Cement, Fertilizer, Chemical and other heavy industries including Marine applications.

Application Engineering

What sets S&S apart – besides its international collaborations with the world leaders in Vacuum Circuit Breaker technology is the concept of Application Engineering.
It involves a thorough study of the needs of any Power System and the development of suitable products to blend with each system.

Quality Assurance for trouble-free Performance

S&S inputs into quality assurance conforms to international standards. Constant checks on components as well as sub-assemblies ensure the quality of finished products.
We believe it is only through strict quality control that S&S can ensure you trouble-free minimal maintenance Vacuum Circuit Breakers.

GUJARAT

Ineffective Accord

GUJARAT heaved a sigh of relief on July 18 when the new Amarsinh Chaudhuri Ministry reached an accord with anti-reservationists ending the five-month-old agitation which had taken a toll of 275 lives. But in Ahmedabad, the centre of most of the violence, the scenario only worsened. In the eight days between July 18 and 25, more than 60 people were killed and over 200 injured in firing, arson and stabbings. The city was again terrorised by trigger-happy communal elements. In just one day last fortnight, the police fired as many as 52 rounds in Chandan Talavdi as residents started firing and even hurling bombs at patrolling policemen. Such shoot-outs have become daily occurrences in the communally sensitive areas of Kalupur, Dariapur, Shahpur, Bapunagar and Nagoriwad.

Chaudhuri: swift action

In a departure from the past, however, the Government acted swiftly and firmly. Chaudhuri invoked the Anti-Terrorist Act on July 23 and a day later announced that punitive tax would be imposed on areas where communal violence is a recurring feature. Director-General of Police Julio Francis Ribeiro organised a series of raids against purveyors of illegal arms. The raids revealed mini gun and bomb manufacturing factories at two places on the outskirts of the city.

At Juhapura, a primus stove repairer was found using his shop as a front to clandestinely manufacture guns out of iron pipes and iron scrap and supply them to residents of Kalupur. The police described him as a master craftsman, single-handedly manufacturing all the parts himself to maintain total secrecy.

The bomb factory at Dudheshwar was unearthed after police found bombs concealed in an autorickshaw. The police also discovered that arms and ammunition were being collected at a supply point in Himmatnagar in Sabarkantha district and then despatched to Ahmedabad's walled city. A raid yielded 200 detonators meant for supply to Ahmedabad. But these raids only scratched the surface of the problem. Clearly arms were still getting through in large numbers. Ribeiro knows that his twin priority tasks at the moment are to prop up the morale of the police force and stop the frightening inflow of arms (see interview).

One theory explaining the sudden upsurge of communal violence was that both Hindus and Muslims were just lying low and waiting for the army to withdraw. As soon as that happened, trouble spontaneously broke out in almost all areas of the walled city. Another theory is that bootleggers who have had to close down business after Ribeiro moved in, are behind the current wave of violence. Opposition leader Chimanbhai Patel said on the floor of the Assembly that Ribeiro's enemies in Bombay were now conniving with their counterparts in Ahmedabad to create trouble to discredit the new police chief.

Fed up with the protracted agitation, citizens had hoped that peace would return to Gujarat after the withdrawal of the stir. The renewed violence soon dispelled the myths. Shopkeepers who had bravely reopened their shops, hastily pulled down shutters after bomb blasts in areas like Relief Road and Lal Darwaja.

But the accord itself was comprehensive enough to hold out hope. Signed after a nine-hour meeting, its salient points were:

- The 18 per cent hike in the reservation quota for socially and educationally backward communities announced by former chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki in January would now not be implemented until a national consensus was reached.
- Reservations for 82 backward communities identified by the Baxi Commission, scheduled to go on till March 31, 1988, would be reviewed by a commissioner headed by a sitting judge of the Gujarat High Court.
- A judicial probe would be made into the incidents of violence which began in February.
- Students arrested in connection with the agitation would be released and the cases against them withdrawn.

In essence, the accord added little to Solanki's offer. The review of reservations for the Baxi Commission communities was the only new concession. While, president of the Parents' Association Shankerbhai Patel tried to save face by claiming that the agitation had been withdrawn because all their demands had been met, the fact is the anti-reservationists were under heavy pressure to withdraw the stir as people were fed up with the continuing warlike situation. Moreover, the opposition parties withdrew their support once they accomplished their task of removing Solanki.

Not everybody was satisfied. A meeting of backward class MLA's under the chairmanship of Budhaji Chauhan (Congress-I) resolved that they must pressurise the Government into not reducing reservations any further. They felt that the Government had sacrificed the interests of 70 per cent of the population to appease a vocal 30 per cent.

But perhaps more ominous was the split in the Navrachna Samiti, the students' body spearheading the agitation. Gaurang Shah, convenor of the samiti, charged that Shankerbhai Patel and Vivek Patel, persident of the samiti, had betrayed the people by signing an agreement in which the agitationists had gained hardly anything. The splinter group which Shah heads vowed to keep the agitation alive until the Government

J.F. RIBEIRO

Firm Steps

THE GUJARAT police have got a no-nonsense chief after a long time—a chief who has made it more than clear that he will not bow to any political pressure. Bespectacled, tall and grave-looking, 56-year-old Julio Francis Ribeiro took over as director-general of police early last month. He spoke to Correspondent RAMESH MENON on the challenges ahead. Excerpts:

Q. What are your immediate concerns?

A. The police force here has been ruined due to heavy politicisation. Even transfer used to take place at the behest of politicians. Police officers were pressurised to do what politicians wanted.

Agitationists in Ahmedabad (above); and (left) detonators and fuse wires seized in a raid: violent ways agreed to abolish the 18 per cent hike and gave a commitment to end concessions for the Baxi Commission castes when the reservations expire in 1988.

Political opportunists like former students' leader Bhaskar Bhatt immediately rallied around Shah but Shah knows that public opinion, the press and opposition parties are not behind him. An overwhelming majority of the state's 40,000 students have also lost interest in the agitation. Says student leader Mahipal Patel: "The students are waiting for schools and colleges to open again." But Shah is undaunted. "We shall fight alone and as soon as colleges open we will use the hostilities to ignite the agitation," he warned.

But Shah's group has clearly overestimated its clout. Their Ahmedabad bandh call on July 22 flopped miserably. A similar bandh call in Baroda also failed. The boycott examinations call has also been ignored by students in some schools. Said Shankerbhai Patel: "If the accord did not have the blessings of the people, I could not have signed it. The handful of boys opposing it are just paper tigers."

The accord has been hailed even by the Opposition. Former chief minister Babubhai Patel (Janata) said the way should now be clear for peace and development activities. Bhalchandra Trivedi, secretary of the state CPI described it as a step in the right direction. Even industry was behind the Government. Businessman I.J. Desai, former head of the South Gujarat Chamber of Commerce and Industry, called upon the Government to clamp down on the handful of troublemakers who were trying to keep the agitation alive.

Though Chaudhuri has earned laurels for getting over the vexed reservations issue within 12 days of assuming office, he is still on trial. Apart from failure to curb the renewed communal violence, he had still to settle the strike by 30,000 government employees demanding abolition of the roster system.

The Centre too was doing its bit to help him. Union Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh was again deputed to Gandhinagar to help Chaudhuri but he made it seem that he had come to discuss the taking over of closed textile mills. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, speaking to members of the executive committee of the Congress(I) parlimentary party, went out of his way to mention Chaudhuri's efforts. The coming weeks will decide Chaudhuri's future but for the moment he is certainly in no envious position.

—RAMESH MENON

criminals had a heyday. We are not here to take directions from politicians. It is the director-general who should be deciding on transfers, promotions and arrests. I am going to call the shots now. No political interference will be allowed.

Q. How will you stop the inflow of arms?

A. We are having combing operations daily, and we are ready to give rewards for information about arms.

Q. Why this sudden crackdown on bootleggers?

A. They are the main troublemakers. Some of them are gun-runners. All this while they were reigning supreme in the walled city as they had political patronage. Gujarat is a classic example of the nexus that politicians build up with bootleggers. The police were also involved. But now, they are going to be told that the police is no more on their side, no matter how powerfully connected they are. I may not succeed in keeping them behind bars for long but they will not be allowed to rule the roost.

Rebeiro: calling the shots

Q. What will you do to defuse the communal tension?

A. I personally went around some of the tension-ridden areas to talk to the citizens. This is not my job. Social scientists, intellectuals and politicians should step in here.

Q. Are you confident of success in your assignment?

A. Of course, but it will take time.

JAMMU & KASHMIR

Future Tense

THE CONGRESS(I) is trapped between the devil and the deep sea in Jammu and Kashmir. If it withdraws support to the Ghulam Mohammed Shah Government it will be seen as having surrendered to Farooq Abdullah's agitation; if it continues to back Shah, its image in the state will continue to suffer. It was to solve this dilemma that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi summoned all 26 Congress(I) MLA's and the four party MP's from the state to New Delhi last fortnight, followed a week later by a frank discussion with Shah and his other cabinet colleagues. But even though he met all of them individually, the party high command seemed no closer to a solution. None of the state leaders seemed to be in a position to offer themselves as viable alternatives and the status quo continues. Said Rajendra Kumari Bajpai, the party's general secretary responsible for J&K affairs: "After careful examination of all facts and dialogue with the state leaders, the high command has decided to continue its support to Shah's government. But we have directed our party unit to keep a close vigil on the state Government and strengthen the Congress(I).

Though Bajpai's vital announcement provided a second but a temporary reprieve to the shaky Shah regime, it failed to set at rest doubts about the party's wisdom of supporting Shah. According to Congress(I) sources, all the state MLA's and MP's spoke negatively about the Shah Government and wanted the Centre to haul it over the coals for its alleged corruption and inefficiency. was led by veteran Jammu Congress(I) leader Girdhari Lal Dogra who, along with others, told the central leaders that not only was Shah ungrateful to the Congress(I), he was even giving the impression that it was the Congress(I) which actually needed his help in the valley's politics to defeat Farooq Abdullah.

The decision to speak in one voice against the Shah Government was, in fact, taken at a breakfast meeting held at the residence of Janak Raj Gupta, a former state unit general secretary and Congress(I) MP from Jammu. During the two-hour discussion, in which the state party chief Mufti Mohammed Sayeed and Assembly Speaker Mangat Ram Sharma also participated, there was unanimity that the Shah Government should be booted out. But there was no agreement on how to do this. Admitted a senior Congress(I) MLA from the Jammu region: "Frankly speaking, finding a workable solution was beyond our scope of discussion. All of us are convinced that Rajivji is capable of getting rid of a corrupt government if he chooses to. How he does it, it is for him and his advisers to decide."

However, all of them did discuss with Rajiv and Power Minister Arun Nehru the alternatives in case Shah was dropped. These were:

- Governor's rule for a temporary period and keeping the Assembly under suspended animation;
- Installation of a Congress(I) government by encouraging defections from both the factions of the National Conference;
- A purely Congress(I) government with unconditional support from outside by Farooq Abdullah's party,
- Dissolution of the state Assembly and fresh elections.

While the last suggestion was turned down by all the Congress(I) leaders, they supported the idea of putting the state under Governor's rule temporarily. But the high command vetoed the suggestion on the plea that it would amount to conceding exactly what Farooq was demanding. Moreover, the biggest danger implicit in the move was the possibility of Shah crossing over to his brother-in-law in panic. The Centre is already aware that Shah is in touch with his mother-in-law, Begum Abdullah. In fact, the Congress(I) leaders have already been warned by some prominent pro-Shah elements that they would not hesitate to even bring back Farooq as chief minister if the Congress(I) betrayed Shah.

The Congress(I) high command will do its utmost to prevent such a political marriage, but it is also convinced that only a Congress(I) government can provide the state with a stable government. Indications are that the high command is in favour of a temporary spell of Governor's rule followed by the installation of a Congress(I) government. Since the party has only 26 MLA's in the 78-member house, it cannot obviously form a government—unless at least a dozen MLA's from both National Conference factions defect to its ranks. Some of them have already expressed their willingness to join the Congress(I). But if the party wins power in this manner it will be accused of violating the anti-defection law. In addition, J&K has its own anti-defection law which is pending in the Supreme Court for final hearing. But the state leaders feel that none of the laws are applicable to the state because it has its own constitution. The state Assembly has not adopted the central law on defection so far. This is why the MLA's who visited New Delhi, in fact, spoke about the possibility of forming a Congress(I) government by no later than October this year.

Congress(I) MLA's in New Delhi after meeting Rajiv: status quo

But the delay in taking any decision will prove very costly for the state. Aware that the reprieve may be temporary, the state government officials and ministers are continuing their corrupt practices. In addition, the ongoing battle between Shah and Governor Jagmohan has also taken a serious turn. Ignoring convention, Jagmohan sent the complaint of alleged corruption against a minister's son directly to the vigilance commissioner instead of routing it through the chief minister. According to Union Home Ministry sources, Jagmohan has been instructed to keep the Shah Government under a tight leash and its activities under scrutiny. The Central Government hopes that since the Government is tenuously held together, it may fall if the governor applies enough pressure. If that happens, the Congress(I) will be saved from the embarrassment of the public outery over its betraying a "friendly government."

KERALA

Estranged Partners

THERE are few things as pathetic as a marriage that has gone sour, yet continues to drag on for fear of what the neighbours will say. A case in point was the 11-year-old alliance between the CPI(M) and the All India Muslim League (AIML), partners in the opposition Left Democratic Front (LDF) whose relationship soured quite a while ago. Last fortnight came the final break. A meeting of the state executive of the AIML in Calicut decided that it would part with the LDF due to the CPI(M)'s attitude towards Muslim divorce laws and Muslim personal law in general.

Said P.M. Abubaker, AIML strongman and leader of the party in the Kerala legislature: "We were smoked out of the LDF for our stand on the Shariat issue. The Marxists had no business to attack the Muslim faith and practices." With the departure of the four AIML legislators, the LDF's strength has come down from 64 to 60 in a House of 141. The four legislators will sit as a separate block and later plan to merge with the parent organisation from which they had been estranged, the Indian Union Muslim League (IUML). The IUML, a member of the ruling United Democratic Front (UDF), has called for an unconditional merger of the two parties, "forgiving and forgetting the past". Chief Minister Karunakaran too has welcomed the move for conciliation.

The CPI(M), on its part, is not having any second thoughts. Party General Secretary E.M.S. Namboodiripad, who is in the forefront of the party's campaign against the Shariat laws, hailed the AIML's decision as a "turning point". This is the first time the CPI(M) finds itself without any regional or communal parties. Asserted E.K. Nayanar, the former CPI(M) chief minister and opposition leader: "We are starting on a clean slate and even if we have to be in the wilderness we will not have any truck with communal parties."

There is an element of irony in the events: Namboodiripad and Nayanar were primarily responsible for joining hands with communal parties in 1967 to defeat the Congress. The move backfired later because the communal parties cut into their own base. The Marxists now hope that the people will appreciate their boldness in ridding themselves of their communal allies. Said M.V. Raghavan, a Marxist MLA close to Namboodiripad: "Let the present UDF rule its full term. By that time the people would have got disgusted with them and they will not win the next elections."

The AIML has long been a millstone around the CPI(M)'s neck. In the March 1982 assembly elections all the four AIML candidates won from what had till then been Marxist strongholds. Whenever it was pitted against the IUML in its Malappuram Muslim fortress it has lost. In the last Lok Sabha elections, the AIML candidate who was supposed to oppose IUML President Sulaiman Sait in Manjeri backed out, and asked the CPI(M) to contest the seat. Said Raghavan: "The AIML could never win an election without our support."

But it was after the Supreme Court judgement in May allowing alimony for divorced Muslim women that Namboodiripad and his party launched a crusade against polygamy and the Muslim personal law, thereby hoping to penetrate the IUML vote banks among Muslim women. Any AIML hopes that it would be able to isolate the CPI(M) on the Shariat issue inside the LDF vanished when none of the other major LDF partners like the Congress (S), CPI and Janata agreed to support them.

Only time, however, will tell whether Namboodiripad's gamble will pay off. But the parting of ways has been bitter. Said Abubaker: "During the Emergency we shared our cells with Marxist leaders but today they seem to be growing closer to Rajiv Gandhi than ever before." Though Namboodiripad's importance in the CPI(M) can be gauged by the alacrity with which it threw out its long-time ally, the AIML, Abubaker says: "Namboodiripad and the CPI(M) in Kerala are like a century-old banyan tree with its trunk chewed out by white ants, ready to collapse any moment."

"Even if we have to be in the wilderness we will not have any truck with communal parties."
E.K. NAYANAR
leader CPI(M)

"The Marxists had no business to attack the Muslim faith and practices."
P.M. ABUBAKER
leader AIML

Chief Minister Karunakaran, on his part, regards the merger of the two Muslim Leagues as a mixed blessing. He knows that Sulaiman Sait, MP, who has been a thorn in the Congress(I)'s flesh, is behind the merger and that in the coming weeks the IUML may become the most powerful party in the state. Says Kadannapally Ramachandran, a prominent Congress(S) leader: "Karunakaran will see that the two Muslim leagues don't merge as that would spell trouble for him."

Ramachandran feels that ultimately Chief Minister Karunakaran will be eaten up by the two powerful communal parties the IUML and the Kerala Congress, which have made rapid strides in the last two years at the expense of the Congress(I). Namboodiripad is probably right when he says that Kerala's politics is at "a turning point". The CPI(M)'s bold stand is bound to affect the direction it takes.

Tribal Trail

PRIME MINISTER Rajiv Gandhi's recent visit to the tribal areas of Madhya Pradesh and Orissa have left behind a wake of controversy. Many of the poverty-ridden hamlets on his itinerary were being visited by government officials, not just the prime minister, for the first time and the appalling conditions of neglect and the heart-rending tales of misery was a shocking revelation. Rajiv also ostensibly saw through the transparent attempts by the state government to give the areas a hasty facelift but the tribals themselves are sceptical of any dramatic changes in their unfortunate lives.

ORISSA

The Black Pot

THE NAME is particularly apt: Kalahandi, the black pot. For 20 years, Kalahandi in Orissa has been one of the country's most cursed areas, ignored even by the gods. There has been no food, no water and consistently empty skies. The drought has lasted 20 years and may continue for several more. Much worse than nature, though, has been the attitude of the state Government. Like an ostrich, it has long pretended the problem does not exist. Few officials, if any, have had time for the black pot and its many problems. Till last week.

When Rajiv Gandhi, shocked by news reports of the distress sale of children (INDIA TODAY, July 31) sent an urgent telex announcing his immediate visit to the area, the ostrich quickly pulled its head out of the sand. The Government of Janaki Ballav Patnaik did not know quite what to do. The prime minister had given them no time to whitewash the area and worse, had telexed strict instructions from Delhi not to do any window-dressing. The state Government —which had chalked up an emergency plan to plant roadside trees, sink tubewells and distribute doles—panicked for a while and then simply gave up.

Well, not quite. It found an easier —and much more ingenious—way to hide the sufferings of the people from the inquisitive prime minister. Congress(I) leaders and senior officials of the state Government suddenly descended upon the district in dozens, ostensibly to make arrangements for the trip, but in reality for a much more devious purpose: to warn the villagers not to open their mouths at all. The message was clear: keep quiet and the Government would provide relief ultimately. Speak and the gravest of consequences would follow. Said Agrasain Punji, sarpanch of Amlapalli, where Panasi Punji had recently abandoned her 12-year-old sister-in-law out of despair: "Jagannath Patnaik, Congress MP, came and asked the villagers not to complain before the prime minister or tell him about the distress sale of the little girl." They were threatened that if any villager opened his mouth, he would be arrested. In Komna block, 25 km from Amlapalli, most of the villagers say they felt they were being closely watched throughout.

In Chatta village in Komna block, in fact, seven deaths had marked the start of the prime minister's tour. Deaths, which even at that point, District Magistrate Radha Ballav Patnaik refused to believe, had happened. "I have received no such report," he shrugged, "let the people say what they want." But Bhella medical officer Dr B. Negi has reports of these fatalities and their cause, which he states quite simply: "Malnutrition and undernutrition are common in Chatta and the people there need only one prescription—food."

PRASANTA PATNAIK

Famine-stricken mother and child in Chatta: lips sealed

Fortunately for the state Government, though, Chatta village had been cut off from Komna due to overflowing nullahs and rivers and so it had been conveniently kept out of the prime minister's itinerary. Said Chabiram, a Harijan who lives in Chatta and whose mother died due to hunger: "As it was raining continuously for three days, we could not go out to collect wild leaves which most of the villagers boil and eat for survival. While my wife and I could withhold hunger for three days, my 60-year-old diseased mother could not stand it and collapsed."

And yet, however sorry may be the plight of Chatta or Brandapatti, they are certainly not the worst-hit villages. An old Congress worker at Komna felt that the prime minister should have seen at least one of the villages where the condition of the people was really pitiable—villages such as Rajna, Jharnamal, Kalimati, Mathia, Deodhara, Kundrapada and Dharabhatta.

Instead the authorities selected two villages in Komna block—Karamahul and Mahulbhatta—to present to the prime minister. Mahulbhatta is a comparatively well-off village with not so many destitutes. To perk it up further, on July 25, two days before the visit, the entire local administration rushed to the village and started an emergency feeding programme under which 80 gm of rice and 20 gm of dal was distributed per day per head.

In other areas too, authorities largely succeeded in showing Rajiv those villages which were neither very good nor very bad. Local officials disclosed that the Government tried hard to strike off both Sinapalli and Boden blocks, two of the most god-forsaken areas, from the itinerary. But it seems the prime minister insisted on visiting particularly those areas that INDIA TODAY had mentioned in its report. Officials argued that both these areas had been cut off from all sides and were impossible to approach but the prime minister insisted and helipads were quickly constructed.

At last the truth came tumbling out. Although Boden block proved to be inaccessible, the reality in the villages of Sinapalli and Nawapara blocks was quite an experience for the prime minister. The poor with their empty bowls laid themselves before his open jeep, unmindful of the threats of the state Government. Those who have nothing, have nothing to lose. Rajiv listened to them with his characteristic patience while the chief minister looked on embarrassed and crestfallen.

At one stage, both Rajiv and Sonia —who was accompanying him—jumped out of the jeep and walked into the house of Narhari Pande, 60, asked him now how he was. "My two sons are bonded labourers," he cried before Rajiv, "they get paddy worth Rs 500 a year." Later the same day, a young villager came and stood in front of Rajiv's jeep pleading for help. Rajiv asked him how much he earned for a day's work. "Three rupees" he replied in Oriya. Unable to understand Rajiv turned to the chief minister. Patnaik replied that the villager got six rupees for a day's work. Those around who understood the language were aghast at the chief minister's words. But the prime minister, it seemed, had got the message.

This happened in Kapsi, which is fairly close to the block office. "You can imagine what the condition is like in the interiors," said Somnath Das. No one had received old-age pension and last year only four people got loans under the Integrated Rural Development Programme. Kapsi is not as bad as other villages in nearby Mangalabre panchayat, only 29 km away, but there are no communication links so everyone has forgotten that they even exist.

What was encouraging though was that this was the first time that a prime minister wanted to come down from Delhi and see life as it actually was. At a public meeting in Nawapara subdivision, villagers complained before Rajiv that no one had come to see them before, that no one had cared. "I have come here and I have seen the condition," said a moved Rajiv, "I heard a lot of complaints about corruption, non-implementation of anti-poverty programmes and the inefficiency of local officials. I promise you that something will be done."

The chief minister himself has not been exactly comfortable since Rajiv announced his intention to visit Kalahandi. Patnaik was preparing for September when Rajiv was supposed to come and inaugurate the Rengali dam. Officials close to him revealed that when he received Rajiv's telex, he panicked and rushed to Kalahandi—for the first time since December 1981 when he had gone there to lay the foundation-stone of some industries which till now have not taken off. Patnaik was not a little shocked by what he saw. He went to two villages, Sakhapara in Nawapara block and Chatta in Komna block. He found women boiling leaves since there was no grain. Before he could reach Chatta, five people had died. The chief minister had no words to express his sympathy.

The next day, when he returned to his capital, he filed an eight-page note to various department heads. The note was intended to suggest guidelines for future action. It pointed out that 57 posts of doctors and paramedics were vacant, doctors appointed on an ad hoc basis had disappeared, kits distributed to farmers contained spurious medicines or had not been distributed at all. Not even half of the anti-poverty programmes had been implemented. The chief minister then sanctioned emergency funds to meet the situation, including Rs 5 lakh for cashew plantation in Sinapalli, Boden and Khariar blocks. He sent ministers and officials to see if something could still be done.

In all the five blocks that Rajiv visited, an emergency feeding programme had been started. But villagers are sceptical: they say the programme was started on July 23, barely four days before the prime minister's visit and may be withdrawn soon. Moreover, in 20 villages, such feeding was covering only about 90 people, mostly children, expectant and nursing mothers. The aged were still waiting.

The district magistrate claimed that the Government had sanctioned Rs 35 lakh for drought relief and on July 24, got the go-ahead for Rs 20 lakh to start work under the project division of roads and buildings. But even for an emergency such as this, the administration worked in its own ham-handed way. The magistrate revealed that in Nawapara subdivision Rs 7.3 lakh had been sanctioned for renovation of tanks but only Rs 32,000 could be spent till June and against a sanction of Rs 1.38 lakh for the repair of roads, only Rs 7,000 had been utilised.

Those who have lived the longest are the most cynical of all. The unlucky few who were alive when the 20-year drought started in 1965 and are still alive now, recall that at that time Mrs Indira Gandhi, the then prime minister, had come rushing to see their plight and had made many promises. This time her son Rajiv was doing the same. "Nothing could be done for us in 20 years," says elderly Ram Chandra of Komna, "what can happen in the future?"

To Ram Chandra's acerbic question, nobody seems to have a ready reply. Kapil Narain Tiwary, an ex-MLA who has been extensively studying the area, has grown bitter with his research. Why blame the Congress(I) or Rajiv alone? he asks, even opposition leaders are a party to the crime. "What local leaders and the state Government could not realise in 20 years, how can Rajiv realise in a few hours?" he asks. The fate of Kalahandi, it seems, is at the mercy of no one. To many people, Rajiv Gandhi's visit on July 27 had roused hopes but barely a few days later they were likening it to the illusory clouds in their skies that thundered but never rained. Now that Rajiv's visit and its accompanying storm is over, manna must continue to elude Kalahandi.

MADHYA PRADESH

Fairy Story

IT HAD the dreamlike quality of a fairy-tale. One day last fortnight, a flurry of little elves descended upon Madhya Pradesh's most backward villages, waving their magic wands, turning pumpkins into carriages and dingy hovels into mansions. In hordes came the senior officials of the state Government to areas they had neither seen nor cared for in years, bringing manna from heaven. Into the arms of the dumbstruck villagers, they dropped sewing machines, bicycles and buffaloes. Within a week, roads came up in the villages, hundreds of workers suddenly found themselves with jobs, electricity poles were dug and for the first time, many villagers switched on lights in their homes. Shops were quickly built and filled with provisions from the city, the thatched huts were repaired and whitewashed. Overnight, one of the country's poorest and most wretched areas was miraculously transformed into a smiling, prosperous countryside.

Something, however, did not ring quite true about the speed and the sudden philanthropy. And as the villagers soon discovered, all this milk of human kindness had flown for no altruistic reasons but to present the picture of a well-developed and prosperous state to the prime minister on his visit to Madhya Pradesh. The state ostensibly spends Rs 80 crore a year on tribal welfare and this year the new prime minister decided to drop by and see for himself just where all that money was going.

Unfortunately for the diligent little elves, the window-dressing was apparent not only to the villagers but also to the prime minister. Severely ticking off both, the chief minister and the tribal welfare minister, Rajiv insisted on seeing it like it was. He pulled on his rubber boots and walked through the slush into the interiors of the village where the true story behind the fairy-tale emerged:

▶ In Ranjana village in Bilaspur district, over 400 workers were engaged for 10 days to build approach roads, plant seedlings, construct helipads and repaint huts. Electric poles were hastily planted and electricity brought to the village in a matter of days.

▶ Anandpur, a desolate and ignored village in Sargunja district, also felt some of the magic. The Forest Department gave overnight employment to over 300 workers in a four-acre plantation; a government-run shop sprang up next to a freshly painted veterinary hospital —complete with beaming cows. A well costing Rs 20,000 was sunk, a 3-km approach road was built for the occasion and even lined with freshly planted shrubs. Schools were repainted and all children given fresh uniforms.

▶ At Kusma village, 10 trucks were engaged at the astronomical rate of Rs 900 a day and 400 workers hired, who within 10 days transformed their godforsaken hamlet into a sparkling village of the future. Electric poles were brought from a village 6 km away, a nearby irrigation dam was repainted and a huge platform erected for the prime minister to gaze from at the picturesque site.

BHAWAN SINGH

Bharat Lal with bicycles: windfall

Other villages too got their share of the goodies. In Bastar, the crumbling roof of a children's playhouse was replaced with bricks and given a shiny coat of paint. In a school building in Raipur, fresh new cots were donated and elsewhere in the same village, waiters in a restaurant peddled the most exotic dishes as the staple diet of the tribals.

What turned out to be the costliest mopping-up operation in any state began with a polite remark in June by Chief Minister Motilal Vora to the prime minister asking him to visit his state. To Vora's utter surprise, Rajiv said he would and by end-June, messages were rolling in announcing the visit of the VVIP, complete with the list of villages to be visited. A panicked chief minister hastily called a meeting of his district officials. "The prime minister is interested in finding out what is happening in Integrated Rural Development Programme (IRDP) and other schemes," he warned them.

The next day the officials rushed back to their districts and started operation cover-up. Some, amazingly enough, did not even know where some of the villages were and had to look up old vintage maps to locate them. Vora admitted to INDIA TODAY that he did order a little window-dressing. "I asked some officials to spruce things up. We wanted to present to the prime minister a good picture of the state." Tribal Welfare Minister R.S. Shastri went a step further. "Yes," he said, "the prime minister did tell me that leepapotinahi chalegi (whitewashing won't do), but he was actually referring to the fact that huts were repainted. He did not seem upset with the window-dressing."

Wherever he went, the prime minister asked the villagers whether they were happy, if they had enough and one question that made state officials tremble everytime: whether everything they had was new or if they had had it from before. Still, Madhya Pradesh officials were happy enough when, after a few tense days, Rajiv said he was impressed with what he saw "except in one place". About the obvious window-dressing, Rajiv said: "In a way it is good that at least people have benefited."

The villagers themselves are not so sure now. They have become cynical with the times. Said Kitab Singh, sarpanch of village Ranjana: "We have got the benefits, but for how long? The villagers were given electricity, clothes but everything was done to show Rajiv that all is well here. In reality, it was a total farce." Initially, though, they were euphoric that they would finally get electricity after many years of crying for it. But they soon realised that the electric poles that had sprung up overnight would reach only nine of the 300 houses in the village. "What about the rest?" asks Kitab Singh angrily. "Do we have to wait for the prime minister's next visit?"

Like electricity, some of the villagers were favoured with sudden loans, even those who didn't want them. Two days before the royal visit, Bharat Lal, a grocery shop owner, was given Rs 5,000 for six cycles. The loan was given under the IRDP. However, a day later bank officials had second thoughts about asking Bharat Lal to parade his new wheels before the prime minister. Said Lal: "They told me not to show them to Rajiv since they all look new." More important, the loan of a bicycle is hardly the kind that will alter the state of the rural economy.

If official records are correct, only 15 families in this village have benefited under the IRDP and most have been grocers. Till December '84, no loans were given for buffaloes at all. But in an amazing burst of speed before Rajiv's visit, bank officials decided to sanction villager Chandrika Prasad's loan application filed a year ago. Chandrika had asked for a bullock-cart, but in the hurry, he received only the bullocks. "Will I ever get a cart now?" he asks mournfully.

In Anandpur, the villagers have had no water for years and have had to walk 4 km even to fetch their drinking water. On the eve of Rajiv's visit, a well worth Rs 20,000 was constructed in one short week. Now the villagers wonder how soon it will go dry. Said Shatrugan Prasad Sonkar, who made frequent trips to the village with officials: "I suspect that four tankers had come and filled the well with water." A drilling pump kept on display when Rajiv came, has now disappeared. So has a mobile van selling groceries. The well-decorated van had zipped around the village hoping to catch Rajiv's eye as his motorcade went past. The empty well, the disappearing luxuries are not the only things the villagers are peeved about. Many with genuine problems were deliberately kept away from Rajiv. Said Banda Ram, a tribal: "When they realised that some of us would complain, they carefully screened us. I wanted to garland Rajiv, but they asked me whether I have a patta (a land registration certification). I replied in the negative. I was then told to stay back." Only those with pattas were allowed to see the prime minister.

Yet, in spite of such precautions, Rajiv did manage to visit the poor home of Ram Charan who lost his hands working in a colliery. Ram Charan bowed at Rajiv's feet and asked for help. Now that the prime minister has gone home, he is unsure that he will get it. "The prime minister said he would get me a job. But since he left no one has come here. Are these merely empty promises even from the noble one?"

Hemanti, a mother of two children, is growing desperate. "After Rajiv left there is no work," she laments. "The price of rice, sugar and kerosene sold cheaply to us when he was here has gone up again." Rice per kilo has jumped from Rs 2.50 to Rs 2.60, sugar from Rs 3.75 to Rs 4 and kerosene from Rs 2.50 to Rs 2.75. "Saab, please tell this to Rajiv," she pleads, "he must help us."

There is more than suffering under the whitewashed surfaces of the villages of Madhya Pradesh: there is trouble brewing that may well escalate into a crisis. For two years, there has been no rain in Jhabua district. The land is barren, the earth parched and the forests dying. As a result of no food and no money, tribals have taken out their old bows and arrows and have begun to attack and loot motorists. In Jhabua proper, the market-place was looted by tribals in broad daylight. Khazi, a villager, managed to acquaint Rajiv with the problems. "There is no irrigation facility, no water. People are fleeing the villages. Cattle are dying." Rajiv promised to do something about it.

BHAWAN SINGH

Thanks to Rajiv's visit, Jhabua got a new motorable road overnight

Whether he is able to ultimately reach out to his wretched villagers or not, his visit has certainly left behind a new awareness. "Unless you speak up," he has been telling the tribals, "we won't know your problems." And now, it seems villagers are getting ready to do just that. Kitab Singh, for instance, threatened to write a personal letter to the prime minister. Said he: "The whole system is corrupt and the only way out is for people like Rajiv to visit us more often. If that happens, then these officials can be taught a lesson."

Whatever the benefits that may come out of Rajiv's visit, there is no denying that a phenomenal sum has been spent on the visit itself and some wonder whether it has been worth it. According to local officials, the expenditure on only one part of the prime minister's tour of Bilaspur and Sarjunga districts is estimated to be about Rs 50 lakh. Much more was of course spent in converting a pock-marked, poverty-ridden area into paradise in one short week.

The worst of it, of course, is that in this paradise nothing is real. In Katghori village, a shop was quickly set up and stocked with provisions. But according to the shop-owner Sunder Sheth: "Months before Rajiv's visit we had only three quintals of rice, four quintals of sugar and one drum of kerosene." The quota was instantly increased a week before the visit to 23 and nine quintals and eight drums respectively. "For several days tribals were given the essential commodities and were expected to tell the prime minister that all was well," says a villager.

In this land of plenty, officials had also arranged interviews with smiling and well-to-do villagers. Bechu Singh, a crippled tailor, was duly presented before Rajiv. Bechu told him how great everything was in the villages and how pleased he was with the loan arrangements of the banks. Talking to INDIA TODAY, however, he told a different story. He had been given a sewing machine through the bank and bank officials had visited him the previous day and briefed him on what to say. As a neighbour admitted: "He was coached to say everything . He got the machine only a day before Rajiv came here."

But, sewing machines and bicycles are not going to help the villagers—and now they seem to be realising this. Seventy-year-old Gosai Jaggu from Anandpur put it quite bluntly: "We don't want electricity. We want fodder for our cattle and someone sympathetic to our problems." If that sympathy—and more important, action—doesn't come from the high command soon, the fairy-tale that began in Madhya Pradesh's most backward villages last fortnight may end up as a horror story.

SHAHNAWAZ BHUTTO

Death on the Riviera

WITH unfaltering tenacity, tragedy continues to stalk the Bhutto clan, after the hanging of its patriarch, Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto in 1979, the long incarceration of the Bhutto women, Begum Nusrat and Benazir, the discovery of a debilitating illness afflicting Nusrat Bhutto and their eventual exile abroad, the family was back in the news last fortnight following the mysterious death of its youngest member, Shahnawaz, aged 26, in the ritzy French resort of Cannes. The discovery of Shahnawaz's lifeless body in the living room of his sumptuous apartment situated at one of Cannes' most elegant addresses—Avenue Du Roi Albert—spurred many a vacationing journalist in sunny Cote d' Azur into action.

There has constantly been a touch of mystery and hidden menace in the activities of the swashbuckling Bhutto brothers—Shahnawaz and Murtaza (32)—who were the "military commander" and the "chief" of the shadowy organisation, Al Zulfiqar. Their movements were enigmatic and ever since the hijacking of a PIA airliner in March 1981, they sacrificed to an extent their buccaneering image to maintain a resolutely low profile. Al Zulfiqar ('Sword of Ali') originated in London soon after Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto's hanging—which was widely condemned as a travesty of justice. A small faction of leftist students, ex-army officers and members of the disbanded Federal Security Agency—Bhutto's dreaded secret police—took a solemn pledge to oust the military dictatorship of General Zia-ul-Haq. Murtaza and Shahnawaz's life-style underwent a dramatic change—from the scholarly (and often leisurely) precincts of Harvard and Oxford to one of leading a guerrilla network: they travelled to capitals in north Africa and the Middle East, Western Europe and the United States, often cultivating their late father's contacts, to raise both funds and arms for their organisation. The brothers—married to daughters of an Afghan official working with the foreign ministry—were sometimes reported to have been sighted in Tripoli or Damascus, Paris or London, and once even Bombay. Shahnawaz, with his wife Rehana and their three-year-old daughter Sassi—reportedly moved into their swanky Cannes apartment only recently. While his mother Nusrat was recuperating also in the south of France, the Bhutto family maintained apartments in neighbouring Nice.

Following the discovery of his body, a crack French investigating team from the "Brigade Criminelle" in Cannes quickly moved into action. First reports suggested that there was no evidence of 'foul play'. However, Rene Gasiglia, the doctor commissioned by the police to examine Shahnawaz's body, refused to issue a death certificate. Following this awkward development, the public prosecutor's office in Grasse ordered an autopsy. At the time of going to the press, the findings have not yet been revealed. The principal commissioner of the "Surete Urbaine de Cannes", who is investigating the case, also refused to make any comments to the press until the investigations had been fully completed. In the past four days, the commissioner, aided by a selected team of top police officers, were busy interrogating Shahnawaz's wife and other family members.

Shahnawaz in Kabul in 1981

Overnight, a welter of bizarre theories concerning Shahnawaz's death were circulating in Cannes, some of which were picked up by the regional press whose front-page coverage at this time of the vacation season is usually confined to spotting and photographing the most curvaceous bronzed beauty on the beaches of Cannes. It was alleged that an empty vial that presumably contained poison was found near his body. The strongest of the rumours stated that he had been administered poison by someone. According to this speculation, Shahnawaz, as well as his brother Murtaza, always carried a poison pellet with them to avoid torture in case they were kidnapped by agents of the Pakistan Government. The three different versions spoke of Shahnawaz's alleged differences with his mother Nusrat, his brother Murtaza and his wife Rehana.

According to the first, the Begum was unhappy that he had married an Afghan official's daughter and had personally preferred a girl of Iranian descent. The second concerned incompatible differences of opinion over tactics and strategy with Murtaza regarding the Al Zufiqar organisation. The third spoke of a quarrel with his wife on the eve of his death, ostensibly because she wanted to "go dancing" and he preferred the casino. As to why such seemingly inconsequential issues should provoke someone to poison Shahnawaz is unclear. A fourth version—reported from a Parisian radio station—claimed that Shahnawaz had suffered a serious motorbike accident in Czechoslovakia and he was in agonising pain. He was under heavy sedation and often took pain-killers. Unable to endure

None of these threats will stop me. Pakistan is my country, I intend to return and along with me my party workers will also go.

BENAZIR BHUTTO

"There was no family feud"

FOLLOWING the sudden death of her brother Shahnawaz, the demands on Benazir, acting chairman of the Pakistan People's Party (PPP) seemed to have multiplied. While waiting for the French investigating authorities to pronounce their verdict on the causes leading to Shahnawaz's untimely death, Benazir flew into London from Nice for a three-hour emergency conclave with party activists to finalise her plans to return to Pakistan and also to meet the hundreds of callers offering condolences. Among the callers were such leading figures of Pakistan's opposition such as Wali Khan, Ghulam Jatoi, Mustafa Khan and Mumtaz Bhutto. Benazir also responded to written questions put by INDIA TODAY communicated through Amal Magazine—the official organ of the Pakistan People's Party. Excerpts:

On Shahnawaz's death:

Shahnawaz did not die a natural death. How this tragedy happened we can't say for the moment. The French police are investigating into all aspects of the case and say it will take another two weeks. If it had been a natural death, the investigations could not have taken so long. Now only after their findings are officially announced, then all the facts leading to his death will come to light. And until then I cannot make any specific comments.

On his behaviour the previous night:

The death of Shahnawaz came about under mysterious circumstances and it had nothing to do with his health. The day before he was with of us—myself, Begum Sahiba, her sister Mrs Hariri and her husband, Shahnawaz's wife Rehana and her little daughter Sassi. We talked until late at night. Shahnawaz promised to take me for a long walk the following morning but who knew we were not destined to meet after that? When we bid farewell for the night, he was cheerful, in high spirits and in perfect health. The next day when his wife rang to inform me about the tragedy, I could not believe it. It was his little three-year-old daughter who found his body. She had gone to wake up her daddy. Often Shahnawaz used to tell that he wanted to visit Shaheed Baba's (Zulfikar Ali Bhutto) mazar (grave). God willed it otherwise and instead he will now lie next to my father's grave. With his death I have lost three brothers this year. The others were Nasir Balloch and Ayaz Sammo (both PPP activists who were executed by the military government this year).

On their mother, Nusrat Bhutto:

It was a severe shock to her since Shahnawaz was the dearest of all for the Begum Sahiba. When she saw his body she was crying and kept asking him why he didn't wake up? It has had a shattering effect on her although like the rest of the media reporting of this case, there is no truth whatsoever that she had been admitted to hospital.

On press speculation about family feuds and poisoning:

It has been scandalous reporting with absolutely no basis whatsoever. There have been no family tensions or feuds and all this press speculation is completely absurd with no foundation. A great tragedy has stricken our family.

On returning to Pakistan:

As a sister it is my duty that I take the body of my brother back to Pakistan and bury it in the graveyard where my father, grandfather and other forbears are all buried. I am not at all worried about the risks of re-arrest. I will go back to Pakistan under any circumstances. This is not a political issue. Where is the politics when a sister takes the dead body of her brother back to his own country?

On General Zia's conciliatory gestures and sympathetic statements:

I fail to understand how on the one hand the general has been issuing condolence messages whilst on the other issuing orders to arrest a number of our political workers. If the Government wishes to convert it into a political issue, so be it. But for us, the members of his family, it is a human issue. None of these threats (arrests, army alert, ban on PPP workers entering Larkana, etc) will stop me. Pakistan is my country, I intend to return and along with me my party workers will also go.

the pain any longer, he opted for suicide.

The poisoning hypothesis raises a number of conflicting questions: if it was not a suicide, it seems unlikely anyone could have forced a death capsule on him since Shahnawaz was an acknowledged karate expert as well as a crackshot. A fierce struggle would no doubt have alerted the rest of the family. Or was it administered in a drink by someone he trusted? All these various versions have been dismissed as "absurd" and "nonsense" by the Pakistan People's Party and Benazir Bhutto's principal spokesman, Bashir Riaz. In a telephonic interview to INDIA TODAY from London, Riaz, who also edits Alam magazine said: "Obviously all these rumours and speculative theories have been deliberately fed by interested sources to the press. There is no truth whatsoever that Shahnawaz Bhutto had serious differences of opinion with any of his family members. The previous night (of his death) he was in excellent spirits and could hardly have been described as being in a suicidal mood. His death clearly is an assassination."

Riaz recalls two previous assassination attempts on the Bhutto brothers by Pakistani agents, one of which in 1981 was widely publicised in the Pakistani press when it reported that Shahnawaz had been shot dead in Kabul. In past interviews, Shahnawaz had been quoted as saying: "Zia would give his right arm to have us killed." The Bhutto family members were maintaining a strict silence until the autopsy findings were officially revealed. French authorities now realise that they have on their hands a case of far-reaching dimensions. In Shahnawaz's apartment they found as many as "300 coded names", 22 puzzling cassettes yet to be deciphered as well as seven passports under different names. Besides French detectives are also said to have found photographs of Shahnawaz with the Libyan leader Colonel Gadafy as well as Rifaat-el-Assad the highly influential brother of the Syrian President Hafez-el Assad.

The Bhutto clan in happier days (above) and Shahnawaz with Murtaza: stalked by tragedy

Some of the various theories that quickly found its way in print in the local press have had no verifiable sources. With some justifications, Riaz demanded to know the identity of the source which was "planting" these stories. Although sources close to the Bhutto family have accused the Pakistan Government of being involved in Shahnawaz's death, here again no evidence has been produced. One source however told INDIA TODAY that a Pakistani intelligence official named "Azhar" who maintained a diplomatic front working in the Pakistani mission in Copenhagen, was sighted in Cannes a day after Shahnawaz's death.

As soon as the body is released by the French investigating team, Benazir intends to return to Pakistan, accompanied by her younger sister, Mrs Sanam Bhutto Hussain, and her closest aides. She will proceed to Garhi Khudabux, the Bhutto ancestral family home in Larkana in Sind for the burial.

Already there have been numerous reports of a wave of sympathy not only in Sind but across the country. Surprisingly, even the tightly controlled Pakistani press has written sympathetic pieces with one particularly laudatory leader in Dawn. The PPP headquarters in London has reportedly been "deluged" by calls of condolence. The outpouring of sympathy has stirred even President Zia. He told reporters that he "shared" the sorrow of the Bhutto family. But the fear that Benazir's return from exile could turn into a sweeping political movement has made the Government in Islamabad react with a wave of arrests. The acting head of the People's Party, Makhdum Khaliquzzaman, who is also in charge of the funeral and Mir Ghaus Baksh Bizenjo, chief of the Pakistan National Party, have both been arrested while leading PPP figures, including Mumtaz Ali Bhutto, ex-Sind governor, are barred from entering Pakistan.

The spectre of Benazir being rearrested also haunts PPP figures here. Already comparisons are being made with her return from exile with that of the late Filipino opposition leader, Benigno Aquino, who was shot dead on his arrival in the Philippines. For Benazir to have any viable office as the country's most influential opposition voice, she will have to return to Pakistan. However unfortunate it is, nothing could have been more dramatic than returning for the funeral of her brother who headed an organisation that is committed to the overthrow of the martial law regime. This scenario could now only go wrong in the next fortnight if the French detectives decide that the death of young Shahnawaz Bhutto involved his own family members. —RAMESH CHANDRAN in Cannes

Hawkins FUTURA
The space-age pressure cooker

46% faster than microwave

Yes, unbelievable though it may sound, it is true! The Hawkins test kitchen undertook a series of comparative cooking trials. 19 recipes from soups to desserts, including fish, chicken, lamb, pork, beef, rice, pasta and vegetables, were cooked in equal quantities in a microwave oven and in a Hawkins pressure cooker. In both cases, the food was tasted by an expert panel to ensure that it was cooked to the same proper extent. The total average cooking time for these 19 recipes in a microwave oven was 45 minutes per recipe and in a Hawkins pressure cooker, 24 minutes per recipe.

Don't believe it? Please write for a booklet showing the actual cooking time for each of the 19 recipes.

Modern Way to Tasty Food

A cookbook given free with every Futura contains 119 international and 18 Indian tested and tasty recipes. Be an international gourmet at home!

New Jewel-grey SATILON® Finish

Futura has a beautiful, jewel-grey Satilon finish which will not tarnish and is harder than steel. It is better than stainless steel because it is stick-resistant and has 13.7 times better thermal conductivity.

New Greater Convenience

Futura has a wide mouth and a shallow body for easy cooking and cleaning. It has a 6.3 mm heavy base which stays flat on your stove and is ideal for frying for pressure cooking.

46% faster than microwave cooking

Space-age Safety Features

Futura's new and unique safety and convenience feature is the cool, finger-tip control which provides instant, safe steam release after cooking. While cooking, it regulates pressure with greater efficiency than any other pressure cooker.

The Futura lid is pressure-locked from inside like a modern jetliner door. It cannot be forced open while there is pressure inside.

When needed, the safety valve operates automatically under the handle which deflects steam safely.

Good Value for Rs.500*

Futura is made by Hawkins, a name trusted by Indians for 25 years.

25 traditional Hawkins models are also available at lesser cost.

All are guaranteed by Hawkins. Go for the best according to your requirement.

DOORDARSHAN

Child's Play

HE TALKED intelligently but with ordinary intelligence. He wasn't extraordinary and he lacks charisma," says one. "He didn't say anything that he hadn't said before," added another. "He had an avuncular approach," opined a third. The "He" in question happens to be Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and the opinions being expressed were by three of the 11 children who interviewed Rajiv last fortnight with astonishing confidence and astuteness. Refusing to be overawed by the occasion, the group of schoolchildren aged between nine and 16 often made the assembly of journalists who had a similar encounter with the prime minister at his first press conference a fortnight earlier, seem a positively slow-witted, long-winded and tedious lot.

In fact, Doordarshan's telecast of the interview turned out to be something of a landmark programme, memorable for its high intelligence quotient, its skilled coordination and the brisk candour on display. As it transpired, Doordarshan had little to do except set up the cameras. The original idea was mooted last May by the well-known, Delhi-based children's magazine, Target (circulation: 40,000) which is a sister publication of INDIA TODAY. When the Prime Minister's Secretariat was approached with the idea, it was agreed to with alacrity with the additional suggestion of televising it.

Target's Editor Rosalind Wilson and Associate Editor Vijaya Ghosh selected the children at random by telephoning school principals to ask for nominations. Before the actual interview, the 11 children recommended were rounded up for three sessions of jointly evolving questions, streamlining them and eliminating any elements of undue aggressiveness. Both Wilson and Ghosh, however, insist that they did not tutor the children. "We only helped in rephrasing certain questions to make them more comprehensible and to ensure that everyone got a chance," says Wilson.

The questions themselves covered a wide area of the prime minister's personal and working life: his views on everything from Reagan's "Star Wars" programme to the image of Indian politicians, his promise of providing a clean government, a new education policy or restoring a true meritocracy. Several times the prime minister was brought up short when he began to ramble. For instance, while discussing the burdens of his office, a voice piped up suddenly to ask, "Before we take exams we have sleepless nights. Do you?"

BHAWAN SINGH

Target children interview Rajiv: rare candour

The disarming tactics varied from pure cheek to subtle stealth. A sweetly-smiling girl began by asking if the prime minister missed being a pilot. Rajiv Gandhi was beginning to bashfully admit that, yes, he sometimes did, when promptly came the question: "Well, what's the difference between steering a plane and the world's largest democracy?" Once or twice he was seen to gasp visibly and slump back exclaiming, "My God!"

His style of running the Government also came up for close scrutiny. He explained how he collected information from a variety of sources and used the word "input" again and again. There were departmental inputs, parliamentary inputs and inputs from intelligence sources. The children patiently hung on to every word. Then one of them wanted to know what, if any, were the "outputs" from his office and how were they effected. The prime minister then had to diligently explain that he sometimes let the complaints against a particular government department collect before he wrote off to the minister concerned or summoned him to ensure action.

It was only the viewer's good luck that the children's interview with the prime minister succeeded in scrapping a great deal of rubbishy political jargon. For example, the word "nepotism" was never used in all the questions and answers about it. He was asked why it was a continuing fact that, all around them, the children witnessed undue privileges doled out to the undeserving?

But the prime minister either misunderstood the question or misheard it because he began to explain the principle behind caste reservation. And the questioner, Projjal Dutta, a 16-year-old student of St Columba's School, when asked a few days later what it was like interviewing the prime minister said, "I had asked a specific question about nepotism. He kept explaining reservation. It wasn't fair—don't you think nepotism and reservation are two quite different things?"

Others among Rajiv Gandhi's youthful interviewers also noticed his tendency to glibness. "He's very, very pleasant and a very, very nice person to talk to," says Shailaja Pachisia, 15, a student of Modern School. "And obviously quite quick on the uptake. But sometimes I felt he's too smooth, the kind of person who never makes a mistake when he talks." Anuroopa Kalbagh, 15, the daughter of a journalist who asked the question about "Star Wars" was even less impressed. "He kept giving us his long-term plans; he didn't say what his government had already done."

But the frankest opinions came not in comparing Rajiv Gandhi to other political leaders ("Can you imagine Morarji Desai or Charan Singh ever talking so straight?" said one interviewer) but his mother. Almost all the children remarked upon the difference, though they had only seen Mrs Gandhi at her press conferences on television or during public appearances. "She would have remained shy, secretive and withdrawn into her shell," said Bonnie Singh, imagining a similar encounter with her.

JK PAPER LAKSHMI CEMENT

STRAW PRODUCTS LTD.

CHAIRMAN'S STATEMENT

At the 46th Annual General Meeting.

Shri Hari Shankar Singhania

Ladies & Gentlemen,

I have great pleasure in welcoming you all to the 46th Annual General Meeting of your Company. The Directors' Report and the Audited Accounts of the Company for the year ended December 31, 1984 have been in your hands for some time and before I deal with them, I must place on record the major event of the year which saddened every Indian beyond words. The former Prime Minister, Shrimati Indira Gandhi, who steered the nation and held it together despite serious challenges from within and outside for nearly sixteen years laid down her life for the sake of India's unity and integrity. The best homage we can pay to her would be to do all that we can to make India strong and prosperous as well as to preserve the unity of the country.

It is a happy augury for democracy that the new leader was chosen swiftly and smoothly. The massive mandate that the ruling party received during the recent elections has brought to the helm, young and dynamic Prime Minister, Shri Rajiv Gandhi. In a very short span of time, he has succeeded in creating a new sense of confidence in the nation. He has tackled promptly and firmly many difficult domestic and international issues. A new direction has been given to the country with emphasis on efficiency, modernisation and technology, so that India may enter the twenty-first century with a firm base and competitive strength. Number of policy changes have been made to reduce control & red tape and simplify procedures. The Union Budget for 1985-86 has attempted to give a thrust to the country's economy through a series of bold and innovative steps. There is an endeavour to make Indian industry competitive and cost effective. The attitude towards foreign investment and technology is more open and liberal. All this has generated a new enthusiasm and confidence in India and abroad. This has also put responsibility on industry and trade to respond positively. Your Company will do all it can to play its constructive role and seize the opportunities that unfold themselves. A number of new areas of investment are already under our active consideration.

The Sixth Five-Year Plan has just ended with substantial achievements. We have been able to achieve average annual growth of 5.2 per cent per annum as targeted and sustain foodgrains production of nearly 150 million tonnes for the last few years. The rate of growth of industrial production however has been lower than the target. The Seventh Five-Year Plan envisages a growth of 5 per cent per annum of GNP and 6.7 per cent in industrial sector. A greater responsibility has been envisaged for the private sector. It is possible for the corporate sector to achieve a growth rate of 10 per cent per annum provided certain constraints are effectively tackled. The major problem is of financial resources. The issues of higher debt equity ratio, lower promoter's contribution and removal of convertibility clause need re-consideration in order to stimulate higher investment. Minority foreign investment in some traditional industries could be permitted to raise additional resources.

Problems of infrastructure like power, coal, transport and communication continue to be the weak spots and the Government has to accomplish breakthrough in these sectors to ensure targeted growth. It is not enough to achieve physical targets, it is equally essential to improve the quality performance. Poor quality of coal, frequent interruptions in power supply, wide voltage fluctuations and unreliable communication are not only frustrating and affect production but seriously damage machinery and adversely affect costs.

Labour productivity and discipline is yet another area which needs urgent attention. Trade Union movement will also have to positively respond to the changing economic imperatives.

What is now needed in India is not only new investment but better utilisation of the existing capacities through improved management, consolidation and technology upgradation. We have become a high cost economy and we have to get out of this rut both from the domestic as well as international angle. If India is to achieve higher economic growth so important for the well-being of its masses, it has to earn foreign exchange needed for its development by becoming competitive exporter in many fields, particularly manufactures. To my mind, this basic approach should pervade our decision-making.

For political stability and social harmony, it is essential that there should be price stability and generation of massive new employment opportunities. We will have to search for areas which generate large number of jobs in the short run. To my mind, two areas which can provide the answer are: (i) massive road building; and (ii) extensive house construction. We already have the required basic inputs–steel, cement and other materials. Creation of large scale employment by these activities would also generate additional purchasing power in the hands of rural masses. It has been the experience of Indian economy that the growth of many industries has been stunted because of inadeqate demand due to lack of purchasing power. Moreover, there has also been the problem of increasing migration to urban areas in search of jobs and opportunities, which in turn have given rise to new problems. These activities therefore would have a multiplicity of benefits. The enormous political, social and economic advantages which would accrue from such programmes lead me to suggest that we should not hesitate to resort to even unconventional methods of raising resources for these purposes.

COMPANY PERFORMANCE

Coming to the Company's performance during 1984, I am happy to state that there has been an all round improvement in production, turnover and profits of the Company. The Cement Division achieved a capacity utilisation of 96 per cent with a production of 4.81 lac tonnes. The Paper and Board production at 65,848 tonnes was also higher as compared to last year. Sales and other income of the Company increased to Rs. 106.09 crores against Rs. 87.84 crores in the previous year. Profit before interest and depreciation was higher at Rs. 16.99 crores compared to Rs. 12.98 crores in 1983, showing an increase of 31 per cent.

The modernisation and renovation scheme of Paper Mills in Orissa with an investment cost of Rs. 23 crores is expected to be completed in phases in 1986 and 1987.

As you are aware, your Company has promoted Orissa Synthetics Limited (OSL) jointly with Industrial Promotion and Investment Corporation of Orissa Limited to manufacture 15,000 tonnes per annum of polyester staple fibre at Dhenkanal, a backward area of Orissa with an investment of Rs. 73 crores. I am happy to state that the plant is expected to go in production well within the targeted date during 1986. OSL will be entering capital market to raise equity capital in the next few months.

PAPER

Last year, I had pointed out to the gradually deteriorating capacity utilisation in the Paper Industry which had come down from nearly 75 per cent in 1981 to less than 59 per cent in 1983. I am sorry to state that this has declined even further to 56 per cent in 1984. Such a low capacity utilisation is a gross waste of capital resources which our country can ill-afford. The bulk of this unutilised capacity is in the medium and small scale sector which accounts for nearly half of the overall installed capacity in the industry. The basic reason of this is that most of these plants are unviable and have obsolete second-hand machinery. Despite heavy excise concessions and no obligation to produce controlled variety of White Printing Paper, these units are unable to stand on their own because of the inherent weaknesses. In my view, such uneconomic capacity should not be allowed to be created any further and the existing plants should be enabled to become economic by expansion and technical upgradation.

As far as large integrated mills are concerned, the infrastructural constraints, inadequate returns and lack of modernisation are the key problems. The obligation on the integrated mills to produce and supply White Printing Paper at prices which are grossly below cost of production continue to affect the returns. It is unfortunate that the price revisions to compensate even the increase in cost of production are too late and are far from adequate. The last price revision was done more than a year ago in May 1984. Here I would like to suggest that the concept of requiring a particular industry to bear the entire social cost of subsidising supplies to certain sections of society or for important social causes needs reconsideration. For instance, the cost of subsidising paper for the Education Sector has to be entirely borne by the paper industry and that too only by a segment of the industry having less than half of the installed capacity. The burden on the industry should not be beyond its capacity to bear and should not jeopardise its health.

In this context, it might be mentioned that according to an Expert Committee, during the last ten years, the cost of production of the Paper Industry in general increased by 186 per cent whereas the sales realisation increased only by 129 per cent. This points to the continued decline in the rate of return in the Paper Industry over the years.

Modernisation of the existing Paper Mills to economic size requires huge investment. It has been estimated by the Working Group on Paper & Paper Board Industry set up by the Planning Commission that a sum of Rs. 690 crores is required for modernisation during Seventh Plan period. In order to encourage rapid moderisation, it is necessary to ease the norms of lending and the rate of interest.

Availability of raw materials has been one of the key problems facing the Paper Industry for quite some time. The basic raw material in India so far has been bamboo of which very few untapped areas are now available. Recognising this problem, the Government has permitted the import of wood chips, wood pulp and waste paper without any import duty. This is a welcome relief. However, the long term solution lies in replantation. In this direction also, the State Governments have recently shown some interest and I sincerely hope that concrete steps will follow.

CEMENT

Cement Industry has made unprecedented progress as a result of assurance of 12 per cent post-tax return made in 1979 which was reiterated again in early 1982 at the time of partial decontrol. As a result, massive investment has been made in the industry and the installed capacity has increased from 24 million tonnes in 1979 to 43 million tonnes in 1984-85. The industry is expected to continue the pace of this growth during the Seventh Plan when capacity is expected to go up to 60 million tonnes. This will however require Government to take necessary steps, as in the past, to keep investment in Cement attractive.

Unfortunately continuous increase in cost of production, inadequate increase in price of levy cement and steep fall in the prices of non-levy cement have made the working of existing new cement plants unremunerative. These new plants set up at high investment cost are hardly able to meet the interest charges leave alone depreciation and the promised 12 per cent post-tax return. I would earnestly appeal to the Government to grant excise duty rebate of 50 per cent and other remedies requested by Cement Manufacturers' Association to the new plants established in 1982 and onwards without loss of time to mitigate at least part of their financial problem. It is not out of place to mention that the new cement plants constitute nearly half of the present installed capacity.

There was an assurance from the Government that there will be regular review of the levy cement price in order to compensate for increase in cost of inputs. The cost of production, because of steep increases in cost of inputs like coal, power, transport, labour etc., all beyond the control of the industry has been increasing continuously since partial decontrol was introduced in February 1982. The Government made the first price revision after a lapse of more than two years with effect from 18th July 1984 and that too by inadequate amount of Rs. 40 per tonne besides 5 per cent reduction in levy quota. Since then there has been further increase in the cost of production besides rise in the railway freight. It is unfortunate that the Government has decided against granting any increase in levy cement prices and has reduced levy quota by mere 5 per cent with effect from 4th June 1985. This will hardly provide any relief to the industry which is forced to sell levy cement much below cost. There is an urgent need to revise the levy cement prices to compensate for the increase in cost of inputs and such a revision should be made every quarter.

Cement is an energy intensive industry. Therefore level of production and cost of production is dependent on continuous and adequate availability of power. Power situation has been really bad in large number of States where cement plants are situated, particularly in Rajasthan, where your plant is located. Apart from heavy power cuts for long periods, the industry is subjected to frequent power interruptions and very wide voltage fluctuations. To maintain production, your Company, like many other cement units, has installed 15 MW standby diesel generating sets at a huge cost of Rs. 6 crores. Due to serious power situation, these diesel sets are no more standby but have to be operated almost continuously. The cost of power from DG sets is nearly three times the cost of power supplied by the Electricity Boards, apart from high expenditure that has to be incurred in maintaining these Sets. Hence, it is absolutely necessary to continue the DG Relief Formula in one form or the other to compensate for the extra cost incurred to produce the cement from captive diesel generation.

Coal, the conventional fuel used for manufacture of cement, is a source of great worry due to constraints of rail transport. The industry has to work at very low levels of stocks of coal and is compelled to move coal by road raising the cost of production substantially. In order to optimise production and to minimise the cost, high priority should be given to the cement industry in allocation of power and wagons for movement of coal.

Before I conclude, I would like to place on record my appreciation to the management team, the workers and the staff at all levels for their dedication and hardwork to improve production and productivity. I would also like to thank the Governments of Madhya Pradesh, Orissa and Rajasthan and the Financial Institutions and Banks for their continued support and co-operation.

Thank you.

KANISHKA CRASH

Ominous Evidence

FROM Cork to Bombay and now back to Cork. The spotlight in the Kanishka crash investigation has shifted once again to the seabed off the south-east coast of Ireland where salvage crews attempt to retrieve key pieces of the plane's fuselage which now holds the final clues to the mystery of the explosion which caused the plane to break apart and killed its 329 passengers. The preliminary analysis of the Cockpit Voice Recorder (CVR) and Flight Data Recorder (FDR) tapes, completed in Bombay last week, has indicated the certainty of an explosion about 50 feet away from the cockpit as the London-bound plane was about to begin descending from its cruising altitude of 31,000 feet. That suspected blast in the vicinity of the plane's nerve-centre—the main electronic compartment (MEC), played havoc with the controls, and tore a huge hole in the fuselage, creating a situation of explosive decompression. The big jumbo jet broke into two or more pieces and the hapless passengers tumbled to their death through the oxygenless atmosphere.

The CVR tape, which was analysed in the presence of foreign experts at Bombay, ends with a sound which some investigators have described as an explosion. But in a statement to Irish radio last week, Justice B.N. Kirpal, who heads the official court of enquiry into the accident, said in Cork that the "possibility of an explosion being the cause is very much under investigation". But he was careful to add that the investigation still has a long way to go before a final diagnosis can be made and the exact cause established. Endorsing Kirpal's approach, a senior government official assisting the enquiry said they did not want to close their minds to any possibility till they were certain they had pinpointed the cause. But the scientists and CVR-decoding experts who analysed the tapes, measured the decibel level of the explosion and the intensity with which the sound level rose after reaching the cockpit microphone located above the left shoulder of the co-pilot. By plotting the noise level rise in decibels, and the shock wave, it has been possible to determine that the explosion was about 50 feet away from the cockpit microphone. This puts the location of the explosion in the region of the forward cargo hold which is under the first-class compartment.

The investigators are reported to have informed the Civil Aviation Ministry that the force of the explosion buckled the floor of the passenger cabin (which is also the roof of the cargo compartment) and the plane probably broke apart into two or more large pieces and fell into the ocean. There is some indication of this in some pieces of wreckage recovered. The rivets in the flooring have parted in a manner suggesting that extreme forces were operating on it from underneath. Buckling evidently took place in spite of several venting areas built into the floor for just this purpose—to disperse the force of an explosive decompression. This was ordered to be done in all aircraft some years ago after a Turkish DC10 crashed near Paris after the control cables under the floor jammed due to compressive buckling of the floor after a cargo door fell off in flight. But these vent holes, the investigators say, can cope with explosive decompression only if the fuselage puncture is no larger than 24 square feet. In this case the explosion obviously tore a hole larger than this. The investigators suspect that a large piece of the plane's fuselage, probably the cargo door itself, sheared off the tailplane or the rudder.

Early on during the investigation, the possibility of a cargo hold door having fallen off and caused the Kanishka crash was seriously probed. After learning that some stops were taken off the rear cargo door of the 747 to enable loaders at Toronto airport to load the cowling (outer shell) of a spare 747 engine into the hold, the investigators sent for the Air Canada mechanics who had done the job. Enquiries convinced them that the door had been fixed properly as it had remained in its place for several hours after takeoff from Toronto. If the door had to fly off, it would have done so much earlier.

By far the more serious matter now being probed, however, is the possibility of half a dozen crates of company cargo—Air-India goods—being loaded onto the Kanishka presumably without going through the bomb detection check. Investigators fear that these crates may have contained a bomb. As one investigator said, "If it was indeed a bomb, then the person who put it there knew exactly what he was doing. The only way to ensure that the bomb was stored in the forward cargo hold near the electronic bay would be to put it in company cargo packages." If that indeed is the way things happened, it reflects poorly on Air-India's in-house intelligence as well as the security procedures at Canadian airports. "What the hell have the Intelligence Bureau DIG and two dozen other intelligence officers (recruited in 1980 after the Makalu sabotage) been doing all these years," asked an irate Air-India official after hearing of the company cargo investigation.

Apart from the noise of an explosion at the end, the CVR tape reveals little else. Power supply to the CVR, FDR and the transponder which was sending out altitude readings to the Shannon control tower, were cut off in a split second. The situation in the cockpit before the explosion was one of placid normalcy. A few minutes earlier, co-pilot S.S. Bhinder had given Flight 182's height and heading to Shannon and then asked one of the cabin crew for a customs declaration form. He and captain Narendra briefly discussed one of the air hostesses, who was described as " a nice girl". A gap of a few minutes is followed by an explosive noise after which the CVR goes dead. According to the FDR tape, everything in the aircraft was normal, the engines were running smoothly, the hydraulic and electric systems were operating till the moment the power supply was cut.

But the last action of one of the pilots has given investigators some indication of the post-explosion death throes in the cockpit of the crippled Jumbo. While wrestling with the control column or in a final convulsion, one pilot pressed a VHF transmitter button which carried telltale sounds to the Shannon Air Traffic Control (ATC). The VHF-1 channel gets power from the battery and hence it was able to transmit even after the power failure put the CVR and FDR on the blink. The significance of the Shannon tape emerged after it was synchronised with the CVR. It was found that the CVR and FDR stopped recording at almost exactly the same time as the Shannon radar lost the signal from Kanishka. But the Shannon tape recorded the sounds of the cockpit for an agonising 30 seconds after the CVR had stopped recording. The 30-second segment on the Shannon tape has a crackling sound, which according to one engineer, suggests that the plane's structure was either breaking up or straining under tremendous pressure. Another described it as if things were being flung about. This is followed by a boom and a gushing sound suggestive of air rushing out or decompression. The last sound on the Shannon tape is a man's scream, which is believed to be Bhinder. Crash investigators are now running voice analysis tests to confirm this and match the voice of the scream to the recording of Bhinder's voice heard earlier on the tape.

The second boom on the Shannon tape has led some investigators to conjecture that there may have been two explosions—one which cut the power supply to the CVR and FDR and the second recorded a few seconds later by Shannon. If in fact there were two explosions then the second one was caused either by another bomb, or could be the sound of some part of the plane breaking up. The second boom could also have been caused by the forward cargo door, or some other debris severing the tailplane.

A senior 747 commander of Air-India described what happens in the event of an explosive decompression at a height of 31,000 feet. He said the cockpit and the cabin would have filled with a thick white mist which forms due to the difference in temperature between the cabin (70 degrees Fahrenheit) and outside (–40degrees F). Exposed to the rare atmosphere the pilots and passengers would have remained conscious for a bare 15 seconds and then blacked out as their lungs starved of oxygen. The post-mortem reports on the bodies recovered show that most of them have "flailing injuries" (twisting and entanglement of the limbs) caused by an uncontrolled free fall from a great height.

The only evidence that the experts now need to finally sew up the bomb theory is a piece of the wreckage that carries traces of the explosive used in the bomb or shows a crack or deformation caused by the heat generated by explosives. That conclusive piece of evidence has so far evaded the investigators, and it is in search of that evidence that the Canadian ship John Cabot is now mapping the ocean bottom near Cork. Experts say the tear caused in a metal sheet by an explosion is quite different from the one caused by metal fatigue. In other words if there was a bomb, the cracks and tears on the remaining wreckage should show it. Even if the explosive decompression was caused by metal fatigue or structural failure it would show. A large part of one wing and other large pieces of the plane wreckage including one large eight- window segment of the fuselage are known to be lying on the ocean floor. The concluding act of the Kanishka whodunit will therefore be played out at Cork, where it all began. Justice Kirpal has already inspected some of the wreckage in Cork and will be going on to Canada for on the spot investigations. He may seek from the Irish authorities the original tape recorded by Shannon ATC. The Indian authorities had earlier been given only a copy which was subjected to spectrum analysis at Farnborough in England.

It is now evident that the Government's confidence in the ability of its own scientists to decode and analyse the data on the CVR and FDR was not out of place. To eliminate US, British and Canadian doubts on this score, the Indian authorities allowed foreign experts to be present when the black boxes were opened and the tapes decoded. The DGCA has now received written testimonials from the experts of the US National Transportation Safety Board and Canada's Aviation Safety Board (ASB) saying they were satisfied with the analysis of the tapes in India and that no further analysis was necessary. Said Pierre de Niverville, head of Investigative Operations of Canada's ASB: "We participated fully in the analysis of the recorders. I am satisfied with the way it was done. There was agreement on that among all the parties."

With the mystery still unsolved, the international pilot community has decided to re-create a similar emergency in a Boeing 747 simulator in an effort to shed light on what crippled the plane. The general secretary of the Indian Pilots guild, Captain K.M. Balasubramaniam told INDIA TODAY that two senior Air-India 747 captains will be going to Farnborough to conduct the simulation with the help of two senior pilots from the British Airline Pilots Association. Said Balasubramaniam: "Our feeling is that the aircraft disintegrated in mid- air, perhaps due to a sudden explosion, because it did not leave the pilots any reaction time. What caused the explosion we do not know." He hoped that the fragmentation and tear pattern on the Kanishka fuselage could yield some clues about the type of explosion.

The International Federation of Airline Pilots Associations (IFALPA) has expressed the fear that "sabotage may in fact have been the cause of the loss of AI 182." In a letter to Rajiv Gandhi, the IFALPA vice-president Stephen Last has enclosed a letter to the US vice-president George Bush saying that the pilot community worldwide was "appalled" to hear of schools imparting training to terrorists and mercenaries.

One thing however is worrying aviation observers in India and abroad, and that is the time being taken to complete the enquiry and inform an eagerly waiting aviation world about the reasons which caused Kanishka to break up. The whole industry has huge stakes in the Boeing 747 and if, for example, it were found that structural defects or fatigue had caused the crash, the repercussions for world airlines would be disastrous. All 747s would have to be grounded and checked for structural fatigue. De Niverville pointed out that Canada had recently changed its crash enquiry procedure and permitted investigators to release technical details of the investigation as soon as these became known. This allowed the airlines to take necessary preventive action immediately after the crash rather than wait for the final verdict of the safety board. This is something that should be considered in India too, say observers, seeing how many diverse and contradictory theories of the crash are being aired in the absence of any official word from the authorities about the results of the ongoing investigations so far.

Meanwhile, there is not a 747 pilot in Air-India who does not swear by the structural integrity of the aircraft. Stories are legion in operations departments of airlines of how 747s have uneventfully completed flights even after large sections of the wing flaps or the landing gear doors fell off in flight. One pilot says he found out only after landing that a big flap had fallen off one wing. In flight the plane had only wobbled a bit before correcting itself and landing as if nothing were amiss.

All pilots and cabin crew of Air-India are now being provided with police escort following a threat phoned in by a hitherto unknown militant Hindu organisation, the Hindu Sammelan of Glasgow. A senior Air India pilot said this threat had to be taken seriously specially after what happened to the Kanishka and the numerous bomb threats on Air-India flights and at premises where Air-India crew were staying. Since the 747 crash, the Air India headquarters building at Bombay's Nariman Point has had to be vacated following a bomb threat. Fortunately this happened on a Saturday when there were not many people in the building. What's more, the Air-India simulator at Santa Cruz Airport also had to be evacuated following a similar bomb threat. Apart from slack internal security, Air-India is also worried about the safety of its planes at Bombay airport, whose outer wall remains breached in several places and people can be seen jumping over into the operational area. As a matter of abundant caution, every single Air-India plane is being checked for explosives before it takes off from the Bombay base. But what use are these checks when outsiders can gain easy entry into the airport and roam about at will? With the Kanishka crash still fresh in the travelling public's mind, there is a crackle of tension and fear inside the passenger cabin of almost every Indian plane that takes off these days. This spectre of fear is likely to haunt Indian aviation till the Kanishka mystery is finally solved.

CHIEF JUSTICE P.N. BHAGWATI

Age of Activism

"Judges ought to remember that their office is...to interpret law and not to make law or give law." —Sir Francis Bacon

IN THE 35 years since the beginning of the Republic and the majestic dome-topped Supreme Court, the Indian judiciary never had a chief who disregarded this view of Bacon more than Prafullachand Natwarlal Bhagwati, the 17th chief justice who was sworn in on July 12. Nor did any other judge in the country's superior courts turn so dramatically upside down the popular notions about their lordships—staid, stuffy, loaded down with gout and wisdom. He is—almost by contrast—lithe, humane, witty, and above all, a relentless doer. Sitting behind the awe-inspiring desk of the court, he has read out in his slightly nasal and high-pitched voice some of the landmark judgements that have in recent times inexorably expanded the scope and limit of the fundamental rights—such as the right to equality and the right to life and liberty.

His assertive pronouncement in a case in 1974 (Royappa vs State) became a milestone in defining the citizen's right to equality before the state: Bhagwati had decreed in his judgement that arbitrariness was the very antithesis of equality. As a result, thousands of arbitrary government actions get struck down by the courts every year now on the ground of their violating the equality clause in the Constitution (Article 14). In 1978, when the Government had denied a passport to Menaka Gandhi, he not only wrote a judgement that forced the Government to reverse its decision but put complex layers of meaning on the single sentence of Article 21 reading: "No person shall be deprived of his life and personal liberty except according to procedure established by law."

In what is almost unanimously regarded today as among the most minutely honed pieces of judicial argument, Bhagwati pronounced that life and liberty could not be taken away by "any law". The procedure established by law to take away life or liberty must also be "fair, just and reasonable and not arbitrary, fanciful or oppressive". He ensured, by this seemingly simple turn of argument, the future authority of the courts to review all such executive decisions. Says an embarrassed Shanti Bhushan, law minister under the Janata Party and a busy counsel: "Justice Bhagwati's judgement on the Menaka Gandhi Case has become a potent weapon in the hands of lawyers fighting for human rights. It has far...far transcended the history of its origin."

BHAWAN SINGH

Justice Bhagwati: landmark judgements

However, his most significant innovative contribution to Indian jurisprudence is public interest litigation, a veritable manna from the skies for social action groups whose plaint to intercede on behalf of poor and wronged citizens would customarily be thrown out by the courts on the ground that they lacked locus standi. Bhagwati blew to smithereens this epic fortress of the state, a binding legacy of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, in a single judgement. That was when he admitted the petition of a public interest lawyer, Kapila Hingorani, who had approached the court seeking redress for the illegal detention in the protective custody of the Bihar Government of a poor village woman, Hussainara Khatoon.

The Hussainara Khatoon Case was a watershed in its own way. It threw open the floodgates of public interest litigation subsequently, and Bhagwati became the mascot of a whole generation of social activists. Almost as a consequence, he amassed a personal popularity which no other judge in India ever had. Nearly a thousand bonded labourers in Madurai, released from bondage by public interest litigation and following his judgement, have named their village Justice Bhagwati Nagar. At Chakrata in Uttar Pradesh, public spirited citizens moved the court focussing on the plight of villagers cut off from the rest of the world because there was no bridge across the river. Bhagwati invoked the right under Article 19 to move freely throughout within the territory of India and ordered the state Government to build a bridge. As a result, a bridge is coming up there and has rightly been named after the judge.

There is always a category of thinkers who regard public interest or social action litigation as a legal duel, or a court-room showdown, with the government of the day. But it is none other than Bhagwati himself who set out his goal when he delivered his judgement on yet another public litigation, this time brought up by the People's Union for Democratic Rights (PUDR) complaining that the day labourers engaged by the Delhi Development Authority (DDA) for the Asiad projects were not being paid the minimum wages. Bhagwati, whose judgement in the case prevented such injustice to nearly half a million casual labourers hired by various government and semi-government agencies, put in the judgement his ideas about public interest litigation in the following words: "Public interest litigation is essentially a collaborative effort on the part of the petitioner, the state or public authority and the court to secure observance of the constitutional or legal rights, benefits and privileges conferred upon the vulnerable sections of the community and to reach social justice to them."

A typical example of his work in outstretching the frontiers of fundamental rights is in his judgement on the case between the International Airport Authority of India (IAAI) and R. Shetty, an aggrieved contractor who complained that he had been arbitrarily denied an opportunity to run an IAAI canteen. It was this minuscule seed of litigation that sprouted into a gigantic tree when Bhagwati gave his judgement. He ruled that Article 14, guaranteeing equality (therefore, non-arbitrariness to all citizens by state) did cover not only the Government but all institutions where the state played an instrumental role. With one stroke of the pen, this 'instrumentality principle' brought within its ken not only government departments but the thousands of government undertakings and government-aided institutions, including schools, colleges and trusts. Says Arun Jaitley, Delhi advocate: "Thanks to Justice Bhagwati, we can cite the same principle in cases against institutions that accept even a paisa as grant or aid from the Government." Says Union Minister of State for Law H.R. Bhardwaj: "For better or worse, Bhagwati is the most off-quoted judge in India."

His work in the field of legal aid has also acquired pioneering importance now. From the late '70s, he began directing the main thrust of his argument for providing free legal aid to the poor people. His argument was fuelled by just one clause in the Constitution, Article 39(1), which read: "The State shall, in particular, direct its policy towards securing... that the citizens, men and women equally, have the right to an adequate means of livelihood."

Providing free legal aid became a part of state policy almost entirely by Bhagwati's single-handed effort and he was made chairman of the Legal Aid Committee in 1980. But, in the absence of central legislation, the cause suffered at the state level. It is only now that the Union Law Ministry has agreed to enact a bill. Still, an impressive 2,84,573 people have been benefited by the committee in the three years between 1981 and 1984. Many of them are shelterless pavement dwellers, uncared-for children of broken marriages, evicted sharecroppers, injured or sick people thrown out of jobs by their masters, and decrepit old men.

Yet the admittedly short tenure of Bhagwati as the chief justice of India—slated to last only till December next year when he reaches the statutory retirement age of 65—is not without a sense of destiny. For the man, with his undoubtedly high reservoir of zeal and humanity and his unassailable stature in the judiciary, has always sparked off controversy. The legal profession seldom openly attacks judges, but the bar of the Supreme Court has an outspoken fringe which thinks that Bhagwati is the judiciary's enemy within, the typical smoothie who nevertheless sided with despotic forces during the Emergency. To his fans, though, he is a modern David, a champion of the little man, who is willing to take on the Goliath of state power.

The first ink-blot of suspicion on his career fell in 1976 when he, along with chief justice A.N. Ray and justices M.H.

JUSTICE P.N. BHAGWATI

"Controversy has always chased me"

SITTING judges don't sit for interviews with the media. But Chief Justice Prafullachand Natwarlal Bhagwati and hide-bound conventions have seldom gone together. Last fortnight, he readily agreed to an interview with Principal Correspondent SUMIT MITRA but the conversation had to be split into several sessions at first because of the rush of court work through a busy week. Bhagwati himself felt that it was becoming like a movie dubbing session. So he called Mitra over to his Jan Path bungalow for an uninterrupted chat during the week-end.

While the interview progressed in his comfortable living-room, by the side of the replica of the blind goddess of justice which would double as a lamp, members of the family lined up on one side to listen to the illustrious patriarch.

Bhagwati, the 17th chief justice of India, was a mixture of caution and candour. Excerpts:

Q. Now that you have become the chief justice of India, what are the issues that will receive the highest priority from you?

A. There are many issues ahead. But the two most important problems are: the arrears of cases, and the problem of making justice easily available to the common man. Large numbers of cases are now pending at all levels. I know it is trite to say that justice delayed is justice denied. But this truism is assuming a fearful consequence in this country.

Q. How are you going to cope with the problem?

A. Well, a detailed plan is under way. But the basic thing is, today the bar is so highly remunerative that it is difficult to draw people from there. And the question of arrears is directly related to the level of competence of judges. Cases pile up in the courts because judges are not competent enough, or there are not enough of them.

Q. So the law itself has nothing to do with delay in the disposal of cases.?

A. Yes, of course. The present judicial system, based on Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, is highly elaborate and unwieldy, something like the Rolls-Royce car. It should become like a smaller car, like Volkswagon, efficient.

Q. Or Maruti?

A. (Laughs) That's a controversial car.

Q. You've always been besieged by controversy.

A. Yes. Controversy has always chased me and I have always faced it squarely. There was a sentence in the speech of Gandhiji which he made on August 8, 1942. That sentence has always stuck in my mind. It ran like this: "Stare at the world though the world is bloodshot-eyes for you. Go ahead for fear of God within." I have always been of the view that if my conscience tells me what is correct then I should brave all opposition.

The present judicial system, based on Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, is highly elaborate and unwieldy, something like the Rolls-Royce car. It should become like a smaller car, like Volkswagon, efficient

Q. Why have you been so very controversial?

A. It has been so for my championing the public interest litigation. For my adopting unconventional strategies to circumvent barriers put up by the Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence.

Q. Is it only this that has made you controversial?

A. I have always been pro-underdog. I believe that justice is made not for a fortunate few but for the large masses of people of this country. I also believe that judges are accountable to the people. Their approach must be people-oriented.

Q. When it comes to a collision of interests between the state and the underdog, as you say, which side will you take?

A. The underdog, obviously. That's what I have done in every public interest litigation.

Q. A persistent criticism against you has been that you have often been inconsistent in your judgements.

A. That is entirely incorrect. People do not read all judgements, unfortunately, and then arrive at hasty conclusions. And then they do not analyse.

Q. One criticism is that your stand on Article 21 (right to life and liberty) during the Emergency does not tally with either your earlier or your subsequent stand. Any comment?

A. The case during the Emergency, that is the Habeas Corpus Case, dealt entirely with the suspension of the enforcement of Article 21. It never dealt with the meaning and content of Article 21. That came up for the first time in the Maneka Gandhi Passport Case. On the Habeas Corpus Case, the point was whether the enforcement of the fundamental right was suspended or not. That was the only limited question before us, on the assumption that the Emergency was validly imposed. The validity of the imposition (of the Emergency) was in fact never impeached. I said that enforcement of the right to life and liberty was suspended, but it does not mean that whatever is done by the Government contrary to Article 21 becomes valid. It is still invalid. But, for the time being, you can't enforce your right. As soon as the Emergency ends, you can still challenge that invalid act.

Q. This is like saying: kill now, pay later.

A. Why? Even today, suppose somebody kills another person what is the remedy? Criminal prosecution. Nothing else. I said so. I said in my judgement that even during the Emergency a criminal prosecution lay. But I said so. Anthony Lester, well-known jurist—he is Queen's counsel—told F.S. Nariman that my judgement (on the Habeas Corpus Case) was the most legally correct judgement. I have never been inconsistent in interpretation.

Q. The controversy about you also rests on your stand regarding the Judges' Case where, it is alleged, you bartered away the right of the judiciary to the executive.

A. The question in that case was that the chief justice of India and the chief justice of the high court had differed in their opinions. And when the Constitution says that the President of India will appoint a judge in consultation with both of them then it is open to the President to accept the opinion of either. In that case (regarding non-confirmation of two additional judges of Delhi High Court), four of us had accepted what Justice Prakash Narain (chief justice of Delhi High Court) had said that he had orally conveyed to the chief justice of India (the objections against the affected additional judges). But, if he had not conveyed it, it would have been bad.

Q. The point is, whether it affected the position of the judiciary.

A. Totally wrong. It was always the President who had the right to make appointments in consultation with the chief justice of India, the chief justice of the high court, and the state Government. The meaning of "consultation" was given by us in the Judges' Case, namely that consultation does not mean concurrence though it should be a full and effective consultation.

Q. It is also said that by alleging that chief justice Chandrachud and other judges had not consulted you before delivering judgement on the Minerva Mills Case, you have washed dirty linen in public and undermined the judiciary. Any comment?

A. I do not wish to enter into any controversy as regards whether a conference of judges was held in this case. I wish to concentrate my attention wholly on what I have to achieve.

Q. If history were to repeat itself, would you still write to Mrs Gandhi the kind of adulatory letter you wrote to her in 1980?

A. Again, I cannot answer this question now. I can do that only after my retirement.

Q. But do you think that judges should have a channel of communication with heads of governments?

A. What do you mean by a channel of communication?

Q. Well, a letter.

A. Not unless there is some work.

Q. But you had no work with Mrs Gandhi then.

A. Of course I had. Legal aid and judicial reforms.

Q. There is a feeling that by looking at the composition of a particular bench it is possible to predict the outcome of a case at the Supreme Court. Why?

A. That's because of the social philosophy of the judge. The people in the US can now safely predict what Justice Douglas will decide today or what Justice Rehnquist will decide.

Q. Is the Supreme Court of India also divided into ideological camps?

A. It is far from true. Judges do have their individual social philosophies, but this does not mean that the Supreme Court is divided. Today the entire team is with me. But opinions of course can be divided. That's in fact a healthy sign.

Q. Do you think that judges should not be immune from supersession?

A. I do feel that ordinarily there should be no supersession unless there are cogent, relevant reasons and these reasons should have the approval of the chief justice of India in case of appointment of chief justice of high court. In a country like ours it is not desirable to supersede a judge if the power is to be left only in the hands of the executive. But if the power is to be with a broad-based authority—then nothing may be wrong if a person is appointed on merit. I would not trust any single person with power—whether he is the chief justice of India or the law minister. Power must be broad-based in this situation. However, in Australia, today, Justice Kirby has been appointed president of the court of appeal superseding ten judges.

Q. There is currently a debate on the emergency. Do you think an emergency can be constitutionally imposed again?

A. Well, there is an emergency provision.

Q. But can the citizen's right to life and liberty be denied in an arbitrary manner?

A. No. How is that possible? Article 21 has been made unsuspendable now. And I wish to add here that I am very happy about it.

Q. Do you like being described as an activist judge?

A. Yes. I believe that a judge should be goal-oriented, result-oriented. A judge has to mould the law, he has to create law and make something out of the written words. Law is a living organism. A judge is not a mimic. He is not an imitator. He is a creative artist.

Beg, H.R. Khanna and Y.V. Chandrachud, sat on judgement over a review petition moved by the state to prevent as many as nine high courts of the country from ordering the release of thousands of detenus under the hated Maintenance of Internal Security Act (MISA), the chief weapon of despotism during the Emergency. Listed as the 'Habeas Corpus Case', it witnessed a momentous hearing: at stake was not only the immediate fate of the detenus but a much deeper issue—whether the right to life and liberty of citizens could be suspended at the free will of the executive even during an emergency.

But Bhagwati let down his admirers when he sided with three others (including Chandrachud, the outgoing chief justice) in the majority judgement holding that there was no remedy against such detention—or even executive killing—during an emergency. In a rare instance of judicial capitulation, Bhagwati quoted from the Upanishads to belabour the point that human rights in India were prevalent since the antiquities but went under when the crunch came. It was only Khanna, the second seniormost judge of the Supreme Court at that time, who delivered a ringing dissenting judgement upholding the right to life and liberty even when fundamental rights were suspended. Months later, Mrs Gandhi's enraged administration got Khanna superseded; he at once resigned. Even the news of his resignation was blacked out by the censor.

Why a judge of Bhagwati's stature and courage delivered such a regressive judgement will perhaps forever remain a mystery. Today he attempts to explain it away by saying that he could not have acted otherwise with Article 21 suspended, echoing, although unconsciously, the Nazi judges who often said: Gesetz ist Gesetz (law is law). "The majority judgement was inexcusable and irrational", Khanna asserts even now.

The critics think that the judgement was vitiated by executive pressure from the background. "Could it so happen," wonders Bhushan, "that it was the atmosphere of the Emergency that had clouded the vision of two very able judges—Chandrachud and Bhagwati?" But there are others, like eminent jurist Nani A. Palkhivala, who hold even stronger views. Says Palkhivala: "The Supreme Court judgement (in the Habeas Corpus Case).... is patently erroneous and is a blot upon the record of the court. It will be a long time before the Supreme Court is able to live down the infamy of that untenable judgement."

The two other occasions on which Bhagwati's reputation of unflinching uprightness was damaged were:

▶ when he wrote a letter to Mrs Indira Gandhi on her return to power in 1980, comparing the coming back to "the reddish glow of a golden sunrise"; the text of the letter was leaked out to the press to the great embarrassment of both the judiciary and the Government; and,

▶ when, a few months later, in the Judges' Case, the Supreme Court was called upon to decide who should have supremacy in appointing or transferring high court judges—the President (on behalf of the executive) or the chief justice of India—it is Bhagwati who led the majority of the judges in deciding in favour of the executive.

Though two other sitting judges of the Supreme Court had written personal letters in a similar vein, using albeit less vivid imagery, it was Bhagwati's letter that again leaked out. Eventually it became grist for his critics' mill. But his order on the Judges' Case was found inexcusable even by some of his admirers. Says V.M. Tarkunde, famous human rights counsel who argued, and lost, the case: "He (Bhagwati) is a judge with a keen sense of justice; but in the Judges' Case he interpreted the relevant provision according to the letter and not the spirit of the Constitution. I am confident that it was not impossible for him to take the opposite decision. But he didn't do that."

It is now learnt that the late Jaiprakash Narayan was so upset by the majority judgement in the Habeas Corpus Case that when the matter for appointing a new chief justice of India came up before the Janata Government, he wanted neither Chandrachud nor Bhagwati to get the post. Even recently, there were muffled protests from the Bar in Bombay against the appointment of Bhagwati. So sensitive to the issue was the administration of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi that it announced the appointment two months before Chandrachud was scheduled to relinquish charge. Says Asoke Sen, Union law minister: "It was necessary to spell out the Government's intention well in advance so that there could be no doubts about our resolve to do away with all forms of supersession in judicial appointments."

But lobbying for his supersession was distinctly in the air before his appointment. Palkhivala himself strongly expressed the philosophy behind the muted move. He told INDIA TODAY: "Between 1973 and 1984 judges were shamelessly superseded as a lesson in subservience. However, this is not to say that a judge can never be superseded—he can be, for justifiable reasons under an honourable government."

For the Indian judiciary, however, Bhagwati is too hot a property to be passed over. For, it is on him that rests virtually all hope of the present bottleneck at the courts being straightened out. The judicial system today is threatened with cracking up under mounting pressure of arrear cases and the inability of the poor masses to find access to justice. The total number of arrear cases before the courts has now skyrocketed to an unbelievable figure of one crore. The total number of hearing cases alone pending before the Supreme Court today is 45,000, not to speak of another 90,000 pending miscellaneous cases. Besides, there are nearly 9 lakh hearing cases pending before the high courts, about 60 per cent of which have been in pendency for over two years.

Side by side, the competence of Indian judges measured by the number of cases disposed by them every year has also taken a nose dive, declining from around 1,200 per judge in 1975 to 949.3 now. The level of the judges' performance too has been quite erratic. While each high court judge in Karnataka disposed of 2,073.5 cases in 1984-85, his counterpart in Delhi High Court could clear only 345.9, better only than the abysmally low record of the Guwahati High Court—295.5 per judge.

"Judges and law courts must be competent." This was Bhagwati's motto all along, and now he is determined to put it to practice. Some of the moves taken in the first fortnight of his being in office are:

▶ a task force has been constituted to advise on computerisation of the Supreme Court which will facilitate classification of case and history, compilation of case law and listing of cases;

▶ a decision has been taken to set up a centralised institute for the training of judicial officers;

▶ a teleprinter network has been ordered connecting the Supreme Court with all high courts; and,

▶ a survey has been conducted which has shown that the high courts will need 185 judges in addition to the sanctioned strength in order to clear the entire backlog within two years (92, if the backlog is to be cleared in four years).

Bhagwati's drive, coupled with his activism, has created a new environment of trust and hope in the country's courts. "He will do something for the poor," says even Shanti Bhushan, who is the treasurer of the BJP. Hopes are kindled because Bhagwati, even at 63, is an endless powerhouse. "Nobody can slog like him," says a sitting judge of the Supreme Court who has dissented with him on several cases. Every year he writes at least 750 pages of judgement distilled out of careful reading of 30,000 pages of records. Says Tarkunde: "He has an uncanny way of remembering each bit of argument for years together."

"Ability to perform a lot of intellectual work is in my blood," says Bhagwati with a good deal of understandable pride. His father, Natwarlal Bhagwati, had been a judge of the Supreme Court and became vice-chancellor of Benaras Hindu University in 1959. It was truly an exceptional family whose journey to fame began from a chawl at Amritwadi in the Bombay of the early '30s. Bhagwati is the first of the seven brothers—nicknamed the "magnificent seven deadly scholars"

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

The chief justice and family: benign patriarch

by younger members of the family—all of whom got first class in all examinations they appeared for. While Bhagwati himself took his first class B.A. degree in mathematics ("maths and law are first cousins") from Elphinstone College and topped the list in law later on, fourth brother Sanat left a blazing trail in medicine and is now Bombay's leading neurosurgeon attached to J.J. Hospital. Jagdish Bhagwati, the sixth brother, is an authority on international trade and teaches at Columbia University: he was in the running for the Nobel Prize in economics a few years ago.

However, it was the eldest brother, already a Sanskrit scholar at 20, who was marked out for his political involvement: the rest of the family was quite apolitical. In 1942, he came in contact with the left fringe of the Congress led by Achyut Patwardhan and Aruna Asaf Ali and began distributing Congress Patrika, a banned journal, from door to door at midnight. He was caught and was sent to jail for a month. It delayed for two years his father's appointment to the bench of the Bombay High Court. Mahatma Gandhi's speech in Bombay on August 8, 1942, in which he gave to the nation the call for the Quit India Movement, left a profound impact on his mind. "I knew from that day that whatever I did in my life, I had to obey my conscience first," he says.

J.P. Thacker, Bhagwati's friend from early days and solicitor in Bombay, recalls that on joining the Bar in 1945, he had soon established himself as a "busy junior". Thacker says Bhagwati was even then a very accurate draughtsman and a "persuasive advocate", specialising in constitutional and company matters. In 1960, at the incredibly young age of 39, he joined as a judge of the newly-created Gujarat High Court (following bifurcation of the old Bombay state), leaving behind, in his own words, a practice worth Rs 1.20 lakh a year in those days. In the short span of seven years, flat, he became the chief justice of Gujarat High Court and joined the Supreme Court in 1973.

A conscious disciple of Felix Frankfurter, Learned Hand and the whole galaxy of activist judges who helped fight colour bar and segregation laws in the US during the '30s, Bhagwati is in a way a shade more radical than his mentors. Frankfurter himself had suggested to the late B.N. Rau, one of the framers of the Constitution, to go slow on bringing all executive decision under judicial review. But Bhagwati has applied the full punch of his legal wizardry to make more and more rights available to the citizen when pitted against the state. Even in the Hussainara Khatoon Case, he did not stop at reversing the locus standi principle. The additional gains for indigent detenus arose from points made in his order, such as:

► surety bonds are not necessary for poor detenus;

BHAWAN SINGH

Bhagwati: enlarging the frontiers

► if the period of detention exceeds the possible period of imprisonment when found guilty, then the detenu must be released forthwith;

► free legal aid for a detenu who cannot afford a lawyer is mandatory under Article 21.

In the period immediately after the Emergency, it was obvious who was setting the pace for the Supreme Court. Taking the cue from him, the Supreme Court made it obligatory for the state to compensate with money the victims of illegal detention. Bhagwati took care to see that the same principle applied to Ranjan Dwivedi, a man held for years on the charge of lobbing a grenade on the car of A.N. Ray, former chief justice of India who had been pitchforked to the chair by superseding three other judges. Mrs Gandhi took considerable political mileage from the attempted bombing, but her administration could never prove the charge.

"Like a mason building brick by brick", says a Supreme Court judge, "Bhagwati has enlarged the frontiers of individual cases to encompass broad state policies." In a case involving Francis Coralie Mullin, a French woman detained under the Conservation of Foreign Exchange and Prevention of Smuggling Act (COFEPOSA) who had been denied the right to interview with relatives and lawyers, Bhagwati not only gave her back the right but ordered: "The right to life enshrined in Article 21 cannot be restricted to mere animal existence.... the right to life includes the right to live with human dignity—clothing, nutrition, shelter, expression are all parts of that right."

Many judges today love to hate Bhagwati for his judicial swashbuckling, his propensity to "make" law rather than take it, and—as is often rumoured—his love for publicity. Some counsels share this view. As Palkhivala said: "The important point is that activism is a good horse, but it is a horse to ride somewhere. If it is ridden only in the direction of populism, it may irreparably damage the constitutional structure."

The horse will obviously run the way the rider directs it. But nobody will dispute the fact that the rights under the Constitution have remained far too long just words written on the text and not tangible weapons to fulfil the first three goals expressed in the preamble: justice— social, economic and political; liberty—of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship; equality—of status and opportunity. "So far", says Bhagwati, "it (the Constitution) is like a gun that does not fire."

Only time can tell if Bhagwati can load the gun, take aim and fire in just 17 months. But there is widespread belief that he can unleash—even in a short tenure—a process of judicial regeneration. And with nine new judges to be appointed to the Supreme Court during his tenure (21, if the present strength of 18 is raised to 30 as proposed), Bhagwati may usher in an era of activism among the grey eminences of the bench.

"Don't be surprised when you discover that the Chemical Division of Thermax has multiple uses for its most elementary product. Even my reaction was 'How come I didn't think of this before?'"

That's the Thermax Chemical Division for you.

At the Chemical Division of Thermax, we believe that we have to exploit the full potential of every product we offer.

So our R&D Cell is constantly engaged in redefining the scope and exploiting the full capabilities of our product line. And you can see for yourself how Thermax has extended the application of our products in multiple fields.

Thermax's TULSION range of ion exchange resins is the widest in the country. These resins have been supplied to just about every thermal power station, fertilizer complex and refinery, apart from a host of other chemical industries, all over India.

Thermax has also introduced the application of ion exchange resins in the recovery of antibiotics from fermented broth, the recovery of precious metals from rinse water, the purification of caprolactum which is used in nylon manufacture, and the production of liquid sugar from molasses.

Or take the example of polyelectrolytes. Apart from use in water treatment, Thermax has successfully introduced its use for the removal of oil from waste water streams. Other areas of usage are Sugar Manufacturing, Coal Washeries, Steel Mills, and Mining and Ore Processsing.

Our range of versatile, innovative products is quite impressive.

An at-a-glance view of the product range

Our products include the TULSION range of macroporous and gel ion exchange resins for removal of dissolved ionic impurities from water or other solvents. These resins are manufactured in collaboration with Sybron Chemicals Inc., U.S.A. We also manufacture TULSEPARS anionic polyelectrolyte, CAT-FLOC-T cationic polyelectrolyte, made in collaboration with Calgon Corporation, U.S.A., and MAXTREAT non-chromate and chromate-based chemical dosing formulations for cooling water systems.

We introduced in India ECONOMIX, a fireside combustion deposit cleaning agent, which increases boiler efficiency, while saving effort and maintenance costs. This is made in collaboration with Chalbar Ltd., U.K.

We also make oil well chemicals, which include speciality chemicals like the 'pour point depressant', which improves the mobility of crude oil; oil-soluble demulsifiers for oil-water separation; scale inhibitors for water flooding in oil wells; and polyelectrolyte-based deoilers.

And we recently developed a handy test kit for water testing in process industries and in boilers.

The Chemical Division in a capsule

Our problem-solving approach and proven abilities have earned us a great deal of goodwill. Even companies not using Thermax systems or products approach the Division for guidance. And we also undertake to train employees of our clients.

The Division continuously monitors the performance of all products sold. Ours is an improvement-oriented approach, with a constant effort to better product performance. For instance, our entire range of ion exchange resins has been upgraded recently.

The Chemical Division of Thermax not only stands tall on our own strengths but also forms an integral part of Thermax's activities. It enables the Company to offer you, across our different divisions, a comprehensive package of services.

From fibre...to fabric...to fashions...

20 years ago in Coimbatore, the home of textiles...

...a 60 TPD plant processed wood into pulp to make quality fibre, to clothe the nation in myriad textures and hues. South India Viscose...a pioneer in the development of the chemical fibre industry.

Within 20 years...

South India Viscose has doubled its capacity. Substituted imports to the tune of 30,000 tonnes of pulp per annum. Provided employment opportunities both at the plant site and at the plantations. Promoted welfare activities and schemes at every turn. And acted as a pace-setter for the development of industrial enterprise.

A social commitment...a ceaseless endeavour

A pledge to preserve the existing environment as best as they can, South India Viscose actively promoted forest development...in the last three years alone they have distributed as many as 3 million saplings; set up a Rs. 2 crore sophisticated effluent treatment plant, the largest in the country and in South East Asia. A polynosic staple fibre plant establishes the Company's continuing endeavour in the field.

And then to a better tomorrow...

A dynamic management has come into force at South India Viscose. Advanced know-how and carefully chalked out future targets are taking South India Viscose into a new era of progress. An era where quality fibres will spin themselves into quality fabrics...and clothe the nation in resplendent colour.

South India Viscose. We give Indian fabric more fibre.

PAPER PLANS

PAPER manufacturers are planning to go ahead with plantation programmes aimed at tackling their growing raw material problems. Companies which had hoped to get the green signal from the Government for setting up their own plantations are, in the absence of an official go-ahead, now working on an alternative strategy. This involves setting up plant nurseries and then farming the seedlings out to farmers near the concerned paper factory, at either subsidised prices or wholly free of charge. The calculation by groups like the Thapars and companies like Bhadrachalam Paperboards is that by making it sufficiently remunerative for farmers to grow trees for the paper companies, these companies will be able to tackle the shortage of wood to some extent. Wimco Seedlings, an offshoot of Wimco, is already in the nursery business and has in fact tied up financial arrangements in such a manner that the National Bank for Agriculture and Rural Development (NABARD) finances the tree-planting programme undertaken by the farmers. At least some of the paper companies may now follow a similar strategy in their hinterland and thereby free themselves from the perennial worry of where to go for more wood.

LIMITED ACCESS

A LITTLE-NOTICED amendment to the Government's computer policy has put paid to the entry by the OGL door of global computer giants like Apple and IBM. In the export-import policy announced a few months ago, the terminology used to describe the memory capability of small computer systems costing less than Rs 10 lakh encouraged Raba-Contel of New Delhi to unveil a series of Apple products, including the racy Macintosh, at prices comparable to those of Indian-made or Indian-assembled configurations. The orders booked totalled Rs 45 crore. At the same time, Kelcom Labs of Pune offered IBM originals at competitive prices. Predictably, Indian manufacturers lobbied with the Government for a change of policy. The amendment of the policy, stipulating a higher memory capacity, has knocked both IBM and Apple out of the small computer range.

POSSIBLE CURE

THE GOVERNMENT seems to have begun considering the privatisation of sick public sector and joint sector units, the first company on the list being the Lucknow-based Scooters India. Two private two-wheeler manufacturers are in the running for the company: Bajaj Auto and Escorts. Bajaj Auto's interest stems from the fact that it has a commitment to assemble one lakh scooters in Uttar Pradesh, and Scooters India may give it a cheaper option than setting up a new unit. However, such a unit will require only 2,000 workers, whereas Scooters India has 3,500.

UNLOADING STOCKS

THE STOCK market is in for even more exciting times, with the Government deciding that financial institutions like the Industrial Development Bank of India (IDBI) and Industrial Finace Corporation of India (IFCI) should unload their shares in well-established companies. So far these institutions have followed a policy of not parting with their holdings. A change in this policy is certain to shake up the stock market because the decision to unload will result in the number of floating shares going up, with a corresponding drop in the prices of the shares involved.

POWERFUL THIRD

IS INDIA the Third World's third largest industrial power? So it would seem from the ranking of the top 600 corporate giants in the developing countries, done by the London-based South magazine. Brazil emerges on top of the list, with 128 of the 600 companies being Brazilian, while South Korea has 80. India in comparison has 57 companies in the list, followed by Argentina (34), Mexico (34), Venezuela (29), Taiwan (21), Philippines (16), Hong Kong (16) and Colombia (15). In an accompanying ranking of the leading banks in the Third World, India claims seven of the top 100, including State Bank of India in fourth place.

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

SYNTHETIC DETERGENTS

THE RACE has hotted up for a licence to manufacture linear alkyl benzene (LAB), used as a raw material to make synthetic detergents. The companies in the running for the 50,000-tonne, Rs 100-crore project to be based at Vishakhapatnam are Hindustan Lever, DCM and Vijay Mallya's United Breweries. DCM had lost out in an earlier race for a LAB unit when Reliance Textile Industries walked away with the prize. That unit was initially meant to be based at Vishakhapatnam but Reliance has since got permission to shift its unit to Patalganga in Maharashtra. So that the unit initially proposed at Vishakhapatnam is up for grabs once again. Both Hindustan Lever and DCM are already in the market with synthetic detergents, but the LAB proposal marks a diversification bid for the United Breweries group.

SHAW WALLACE

Company Cocktail

MR CHHABRIA likes his occasional drink, but for two months he has not touched liquor. His offices in India have been raided, his passport was briefly taken away from him until he complained to the Bombay High Court, he was questioned as soon as he landed at Bombay airport on July 12, and over the next few days he was quizzed for more than 10 hours by officials of the Enforcement Directorate. Enough provocation to reach for the bottle, but Chhabria has fought the temptation.

The 39-year-old Dubai-based-businessman laughs away the suggestion that this unusual abstinence has anything to do with his failure to acquire control of India's second largest liquor company, Shaw Wallace. And despite all his troubles, he retains his good humour, even affecting a confidence about the future: "I have not lost my faith, patience or confidence," he insists. And at the end of two days of gruelling questioning in Delhi, he still managed to laugh in the evening over how his statement about a trust that he had formed for donating funds to the Tirupati temple had been taken down by the government's stenographer as Tripathi temple."

For all the brave cheer, however, Chhabria could be in trouble. The Government is asking all manner of questions concerning his companies, his business deals, and the sources of finance for his takeover operations in India. His bid to acquire a 38.7 per cent stake in Shaw Wallace is stuck in the Company Law Board, with every likelihood of a protracted legal battle to follow. His voting rights in the company have been frozen, and $26.4 million (Rs 32 crore) invested in the company are right now worthless. Above everything else, his bona fides have been questioned, and a cloud of suspicion now hangs over his head.

The point at issue is simple, for the charge against Chhabria is that he got into a clandestine arrangement with Indian liquor king Vijay Mallya (who owns United Breweries, McDowells and a series of other liquor and beer companies) to acquire a joint stake in Shaw Wallace through an offshore deal involving the acquisition of the London-based R.G. Shaw and Company, which together with three of its subsidiaries holds 38.7 per cent of Shaw Wallace shares. Mallya is the brash young inheritor of the liquor empire built by his father Vittal, who died two years ago, and controls 30 per cent of the Rs 500 crore liquor market. If he is involved in the Shaw Wallace deal, his control of the liquor market will go up to a staggering 45 per cent; and clearly, such an acquisition will attract the provisions of the Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices (MRTP) Act. Equally obviously, his acquisition of a foreign company like R.G. Shaw without the Reserve Bank's permission will have been a violation of the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act (FERA). Further, if the charge is proved that Mallya illegally took out his money from the country to finance the deal, he will attract the draconian provisions of the Conservation of Foreign Exchange and Prevention of Smuggling Act (COFEPOSA).

That is quite a handful, and Chhabria insists that he is innocent: that Mallya is not involved in the acquisition of R.G. Shaw, that the money used for buying the London-based company is entirely his, and that he is being done out of his shareholding rights in Shaw Wallace because the chairman of Shaw Wallace, S.P. Acharya, wants to retain control.

While the truth of the matter remains to be established, Chhabria's case is not helped by the prolonged absence from India of Vijay Mallya, who was initially believed to be in Singapore and expected to return to Bombay in mid-July, but is now stated to be in Germany, and due to return only in August. Said a government official: "Any businessman will want to come back quickly and clear his name by answering the charges. But Mallya continues to stay abroad." The only response from him so far has been an advertisement in the newspapers, released by the United Breweries Group, warning that the reports about the group "appear to be motivated by vested interests", that the group is not saying anything just yet because the matter is subjudice, and that "we take a grave view of publication of these reports and statements".

Grave view or not, the charges that have been made before the Company Law Board and the Enforcement Directorate of the Finance Ministry are quite explicit. Specifically, it is stated that in late 1984 a foreign bank operating in India had floated a document seeking to raise $6 million to help finance the acquisition of Shaw Wallace's foreign shareholding by Mallya, who wanted financial partners for the transaction. While no one has actually stepped forward to say that he has seen such a document, government officials say that they twisted the arm of a foreign bank to get a copy of this vital piece of paper, and an official told INDIA TODAY last fortnight that "We have evidence to suggest that Vijay Mallya was involved in the Shaw Wallace deal." But the official declined to show the "evidence". And clearly, if the document does not have Mallya's signature on it, he cannot be legally implicated in any way because he can quite easily plead innocence.

A second charge made before the Company Law Board is that senior executives of United Breweries had approached Michael Cliff, executive vice-president of Seagrams (the Canadian whisky giant), with a proposal to join hands in taking control of Shaw Wallace. Even though the deal fell through, this is interpreted as showing Mallya's interest in a deal in which Chhabria says Mallya is not involved. But once again, this can easily be dismissed as hearsay, so that Mallya may not find it difficult to dissociate himself from this as well.

THERE is a third charge: that an unknown party deposited an unspecified amount of cash with Express of London, in return for which American Express gave Chhabria a $15 million loan to help him pay for the acquisition of R.G.Shaw and Company. The implied suggestion is that the man who deposited the cash is Mallya. In support of this charge, a document has been submitted to the Company Law Board concerning the mortgage for the American Express loan. The mortgage is stated to be "cash deposit being all sums deposited or to be deposited with American Express International Banking Corporation...in an account number to be designated by American Express".

Finally, there is the involvement of a mysterious Hong Kong-based company, Amarante, in the whole transaction. Photo-copies of documents obtained in Hong Kong and seen by INDIA TODAY clearly establish that Amarante has been involved with Chhabria's main company in the American Express loan, yet Chhabria has told the Company Law Board that he does not know anything about the company. Three questions have followed from this: how could Chhabria be ignorant of Amarante's details, who really owns Amarante, and what is the real significance of Amarante's involvement in the transaction?

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Taken together, all these bits and pieces of 'evidence' are used to implicate Mallya in the acquisition of R.G.Shaw. Mallya himself could not be contacted for his response to these charges. And Chhabria's explanations were sometimes convincing and sometimes not. His disclaimer concerning Amarante, for instance, stretched credibility, but he was on stronger ground on some of the other issues that have been raised

For instance, his lawyer argued before the Company Law Board that the cash deposit supposed to have been made to American Express was non-existent, and that the deposits mentioned related only to the income that might accrue from the investments by R.G.Shaw, whose shares were pledged with the bank. Chhabria had also submitted to the Company Law Board a letter from American Express stating explicitly that there was no cash deposit made against the loan of $15 million. The letter, issued on June 4 by a vice-president of the bank, said that the loan "was arranged based on the personal guarantee of Mr M.R. Chhabria," and that the loan "was not cash-collateralised". A second letter, issued simultaneously by the vice-president of the bank, declared that "Mr M.R. Chhabria is considered by American Express Bank to be a high net worth individual and valued client of the bank." While these two unqualified statements should help Chhabria on the loan issue, the only question that arose was how the loan could have been given against a "personal guarantee" when R.G.Shaw's shareholding in Shaw Wallace is known to have been pledged to the bank as a security for the loan.

Chhabria has also disclaimed any knowledge of discussions between executives of United Breweries and Seagrams, and of the bank document linking Mallya with the intended purchase of Shaw Wallace's overseas shareholding. Since neither of these involves him personally, he is on safe ground here. And when asked by officials of the Enforcement Directorate whether he knew Mallya and had discussed the Shaw Wallace acquisition with him, Chhabria had replied that he did know Mallya, that he had asked Mallya about the wisdom of acquiring a stake in

Shaw Wallace, and Mallya told him it was a good idea.

While the fur is flying on all these counts, Chhabria's defence before the Company Law Board has been quite simple: that the money used to pay for R.G.Shaw is his, that irrespective of the various parties that may at various stages have sought to buy R.G.Shaw, he is now its sole owner, and that he paid for his purchases with his own money. Finally, he has asked the Company Law Board to end the freeze on his rights as a shareholder in Shaw Wallace. The freeze was imposed in February to facilitate an enquiry into the true ownership of R.G. Shaw. Chhabria's lawyer has argued that since the investigator appointed by the Company Law Board has no more questions to ask Chhabria, his rights should be restored, while the other issues remained to be sorted out.

WITH the press barred from attending the sittings of the Company Law Board, it is difficult to assess the nature of the hearings. The members of the board themselves have by and large been studiously non-committal, but a couple of members appear to have indicated through their pattern of questioning that they felt the Shaw Wallace management had nothing concrete to pin on Chhabria. Indeed, Chhabria's lawyers have repeatedly argued that the purpose of the Shaw Wallace management is to delay the proceedings as much as possible, and they seem to feel that if the Company Law Board hands down any decision that the management does not like, it will promptly go to court on the issue.

While it would be foolhardy to try and forecast the Company Law Board's final decision, the Enforcement Directorate talks of being on a hot trail concerning related issues. The director of enforcement, Bhure Lal, said his department decided to enquire into Chhabria's and Mallya's affairs following press reports on the Shaw Wallace share acquisition and Chhabria's spate of corporate acquisitions in India, and that they were trying to establish Chhabria's sources of funds. So on July 9, 62 tax sleuths had raided the establishments in India of both Chhabria and Mallya. Later Chhabria was questioned, first in Bombay and then in Delhi for a further two days.

Chhabria gives every impression of not being worried by the experience, and says he has promised to give the officials the documents and information they have sought. But some officials said they were not satisfied with Chhabria's answers. Whether they have got anything to really go on is not, however, clear just yet. But one bit of interesting information that officials reveal relates to Chhabria's personal net worth: $30 million (Rs 36 crore).

Meanwhile, there is one curious aspect of the entire R.G.Shaw transaction that has been brought to the attention of the Company Law Board. Sime Darby Berhad of Malaysia sold R.G.Shaw through an auction. Carrasco Investments, a Hong Kong-based company owned by Chhabria's company Keysberg, was told in London on January 21 that its auction bid was successful. Subsequent to this, an enormous amount of activity seems to have taken place on the same day. In London itself, Carrasco signed its loan agreement with American Express. On the same day in Hong Kong, Keysberg and Amarante were jointly signing agreements with American Express that subordinated their claims on Carrasco to that of American Express. And again on the same day in Hong Kong, R.G.Shaw's shareholders were meeting to take a decision on restructuring the shareholding pattern of the company. The odd part of this whole operation is that Hong Kong is eight to nine hours ahead of London-time, and business hours in the colony would have ended before the announcement of the successful bidder being named in London. The Shaw Wallace management has used this curious timing to argue before the Company Law Board that the auction in London was in fact a sham, though what exactly this proves is not clear.

The still more curious part of the transaction concerns the restructuring of R.G.Shaw's shareholding on the very date when the auction result was to be announced. Before the auction, the company had a share capital of 760,800 pounds sterling in individual shares of one pound each. But on January 21, the shareholders of R.G.Shaw (owned exclusively by Sime Darby Berhad) decided to convert these shares into non-voting shares with deferred rights. Simultaneously, 760.80 pounds of reserves were converted into new voting shares of one penny each. Thus the new voting shareholding was one-tenth of one per cent of the old shareholding, whose voting rights had been taken away.

Once again, the precise significance of this complicated transaction was not clear. But an interested observer commented: "If R.G.Shaw was being sold in a simple transaction to one buyer, one would not expect such complicated manoeuvres. The fact that these complications exist suggests that there is more to the transaction than meets the eye."

There is one final puzzle. In the original corporate structure, Sime Darby Berhad (a Malaysian company) owned Sime Darby Far East (a company based in Hong Kong), which in turn owned R.G.Shaw. Yet when R.G.Shaw was sold to Carrasco, Sime Darby Far East appears to have been liquidated. Like the earlier puzzles, the significance of this decision too is not known. And the question that waited for an answer was whether these puzzles had any real bearing on the issues being debated in Delhi, or whether they were nothing more than corporate jugglery indulged in for obscure reasons.

The Shaw Wallace management's plea before the Company Law Board has been that all these issues should be looked at in order to ascertain what exactly has happened to R.G.Shaw's ownership, and that the documents in the hands of the Enforcement Directorate should also be looked at. Chhabria has countered that none of these issues is relevant, that he is prepared to submit the relevant documents and explanations to the investigator appointed by the Company Law Board (but not to Shaw Wallace), and that an injustice has been done to him in freezing his rights as the biggest Shaw Wallace shareholder.

At the time of writing, the hearings were still continuing, and whether Chhabria would finally be able to get his hands on Shaw Wallace remained a tantalising question-mark.

STC

Rice and Fall

LEWIS Carroll's Queen of Hearts had the unsettling habit of periodically ordering "Off with his head". Vishwanath Pratap Singh now seems to be doing likewise. First donning his hat as finance minister, he sent a number of senior tax officials packing. Then, last fortnight, Singh took on the mantle of the commerce minister to effectively decapitate Prem Chand Luthar, chairman of the State Trading Corporation (STC).

Singh may of course have more provocation for his action than the irrational monarch in Alice in Wonderland. Under Luthar, STC contracted to export 10,000 tonnes of grade 'B' basmati rice (a mixture of 80 per cent basmati and 20 per cent coarse rice) to Abu Dhabi, but booked the order at a price far lower than the going rate for this mixture. STC then proceeded to ask suppliers to ship a far inferior mixture that had been expressly prohibited by the Commerce Ministry. The Abu Dhabi Municipality, which had contracted the supply with STC, and its inspector, Geo Chem Laboratories, rejected the samples that were about to be supplied, and Luthar's neck was quickly on the chopping block.

The controversial deal raised numerous questions that still do not have clear answers. The sequence of events began in November last year, when STC received an offer for the supply of basmati rice. No immediate action was taken because of various factors, including likely changes in STC's trading policy. In January, Luthar decentralised export dealings so that contracts could be signed without the formal approval of the board of directors. Following this, officials of STC's Delhi branch visited Abu Dhabi to discuss the details with the prospective buyers. The pace quickened at this stage when India's ambassador to Abu Dhabi personally requested Luthar to sign the agreement. Luthar, who was then in Kuwait, visited Abu Dhabi on March 6 and signed the sale contract.

The contract was signed on the basis of a sealed sample of rice, which however, STC did not show to any of the suppliers in India. Instead, STC entered into contracts with these suppliers on the basis of a separate set of samples that clearly did not match that given to the Abu Dhabi Municipality. Indeed, as recently as February, the Commerce Ministry had expressly forbidden Luthar and the STC from exporting inferior mixtures of rice to Abu Dhabi. Luthar had therefore entered into the contract knowing fully well that he would have to supply grade 'B' basmati! Yet he had contracted to supply this at the grossly uneconomic price of $600 (Rs 7,200). When the ruling market price was $800 (Rs 9,600). So, did he plan to export inferior rice under the guise of grade 'B' basmati, or was he under the impression —as he explained to the Commerce Ministry— that the contract which he signed was in accordance with government policy on rice export? Even if the latter is true, why did Luthar not check on the low price in the contract.

STC chief Luthar: axed

What lends mystery to the transaction is the involvement of an influential Congress(I) leader. Initially, STC had signed contracts with six rice dealers but all of them backed out because of the low price. Then, a desperate STC official, accompanied by the Congress(I) leader, contracted for fresh supplies from three companies: Escorts Farms, Jainsons Clothing Corporation and S.H.K.P. Babu Traders of Andhra Pradesh. The samples submitted by Escorts Farms and Jainsons were approved by STC (in violation of the Commerce Ministry directive on export-quality rice). But when the supplies were made according to these samples, and the Abu Dhabi Municipality rejected them in a preshipment inspection, STC promptly turned on its suppliers, cancelled the contracts and confiscated their bank guarantees. While Escorts Farms' banker released the money, Jainsons managed to get a court stay order. As Escorts Farms owner H.P. Nanda said last fortnight: "My boys gave them exactly the same rice which was earlier approved by them and the inspecting agency. If STC had signed with Abu Dhabi for supplying gold and asked us to supply silver, we can't be blamed for it." Added Arun Jain, managing partner of Jainsons: "We have been cheated. They never even showed us the samples that were given to the Abu Dhabi Municipality."

STC chief Luthar was not the only one to face the music in the retributive action that followed. The corporation's Delhi branch manager, S.K. Caroli, had been suspended and A.S. Bhatia, one of the corporation's directors who was dealing with exports, has been shunted to another portfolio. Nevertheless, the impression remains that there is more to the deal than has surfaced. And whether Luthar could be arraigned for culpability or merely cupidity remains a nagging question.

A group is known by its companies.

The Essar success story transcends a mere business success. It speaks rather for planned growth and strategic diversification. For synthesis of modern management and hi-tech versatility. It speaks for a pragmatic philosophy that is now a business reality.

Ever since Essar came into focus, it has shown its potential. Today, Essar is a multi-faceted group involved in ship owning and operations, specialised marine and offshore constructions, oil exploration and exploitation activities, trading and agencies...

The group has set up joint venture projects with leading international companies including Brown & Root Inc., U.S.A.; Eason Oil Company, a subsidiary of International Telephones & Telegraphs, U.S.A.; F.Selmer, Norway; Sentab AB, Sweden; etc. It now has a fleet of tankers, cargo ships, specialised offshore supply vessels and a modern computerised diving support vessel. The group also owns sophisticated construction equipment such as dredgers, pipe laying and burying barges, earth moving and lifting cranes, Slip forming and mass concreting machines.

That then is Essar — growing and keyed up for further growth.

ELXSI

Taking on the Titans

WHO MIGHT develop the computer system that can finally take on IBM on its home turf? The answer: a company promoted by the prestigious Tatas and run partly by non-resident Indians.

The company's name is Elxsi, and it has its base in California's San Jose valley. It is now six years old, and its financial performance last year can hardly be considered promising: on sales of $ 18 million, it lost $ 7 million. Nevertheless, Elxsi has a computer system that is claimed to be a breakthrough in computer architecture, and it is now tying up with another company promoted by none other than the man once known as king of computer design: Gene Amdahl.

The marriage is taking place in the form of a merger between Elxsi and Amdahl's Trilogy Systems Corporation, and it might well work out as an ideal partnership: Elxsi has its system 6400, Trilogy has $ 80 million in spare cash plus advanced semiconductor technology, and Amdahl has the brains and the will to provide a computer that can rival IBM's. For, after he helped design IBM's ultra-successful 360 series of computers, Amdahl had started his own Amdahl Corporation, lost it to Fujitsu of Japan, and then started Trilogy, determined as ever to beat his old nemesis, IBM, at producing a unique supercomputer with his superchip design.

Trilogy was founded with the largest amount ever collected in venture funding for a start-up project ($ 270 million), but the company nearly self-destructed in trying, unsuccessfully, to develop a spectacular superchip that would make mainframe computers smaller, faster, cheaper and more reliable. The project was given up, and Amdahl now intends to develop Elxsi's system into an improved version. He says: "I believe that IBM needs to be challenged because I don't think it's in the best interests of any user of computers to have one company be so dominant...I looked at the architecture of Elxsi's systems and software and was very positively impressed."

The David-Goliath battle may, of course, fail to materialise if David fails to get his bag of sling-stones together. Nevertheless, the Elxsi experiment is already proving to be one of the most innovative ventures ever launched by Indians, one designed to ensure an Indian presence in the heart of computer technology near the centre of the action in Silicon Valley. And now that the tie-up with Trilogy and Amdahl is taking place, Elxsi is also proving to be a venture with considerable promise.

The company was founded in 1979 by a group of nine professionals, including Thampy Thomas, 39, an alumnus of the Birla Institute of Technology and Science at Pilani who has a doctorate in computer design from Stanford University, and B. Kumar, 35, who studied at the Indian Institute of Technology in Madras before getting a doctorate from the University of Illinois. Thomas' original plan was to set up a computer research and development centre in India, but government policies and US restrictions on high-tech exports came in the way. Enter the Tatas.

Says Thomas: "I had known Ratan Tata (chairman of Tata Industries) for a long time, and so when we started Elxsi I wrote to him about our plans since the Tatas had an interest in doing something with us." The response was quick. Thomas and Elxsi's chairman and president Joseph Rizzi were invited to make a presentation to the board of Tata Sons, the Tata group's apex company. Recalls Thomas: "What made it all possible was that both J.R.D. Tata and S. Moolgaokar (chairmen of TELCO), were intrigued with the possibility of being associated with a start-up company."
